It was a cloudless morn. The sun rose in majesty and splendor, as myself and friend H— crossed the beautiful stream at the end of the town which claimed our residence. The chiming of bells in the distance and the last glimmering of the church spire, readily informed us we were leaving our homes, and for what? was the ready interrogatory. To visit the eighth wonder of the world: the city of Nauvoo and the Mormons. The forests were covered with their richest foliage; the birds sang melodiously; the prairies were covered with their numerous herds, and the plains were blended with an innumerable variegation of flowers, which lent rich fragrance to the breeze. Whilst conversing upon the strangeness of our expedition; of the expectation of so soon proving or disproving the truth or falsity of every day's report; and if true, the hazard we were about to make of losing life, reputation and property, and the warm solicitations and anxiety of our friends for our safety in visiting a place, and people, said to be devoid of christianity, morality or civilization; and other topics connected with our journey. The time passed imperceptibly, and at the end of a delightful prairie, we were aware the sound of the winding horn informed us it was time for refreshments. A short time and we were again on our way. The day continued pleasant and warm. Crops everywhere showed the effect of a long winter; still the exertions of the farmer seemed no where diminished. Towards evening we were ferried across a stream of considerable size and passed through a rich alluvial bottom covered with a heavy growth of timber. Night overtook us near an indifferent log building at which we found entertainment for the night. Our host seemed very communicative; and upon being informed of our business, voluntarily gave us a detailed account of the Mormon difficulties with Missouri; of their settlement in this State; their many aggressions &c. This account appeared very plausible, although it seemed entirely exparte, notwithstanding our worthy host assured us he had heard all to be facts. Amongst other things he informed us there was a small town called Macedonia (Formerly Ramus) about twenty miles east of Nauvoo, built and inhabited almost exclusively by Mormons. We at once determined to pass through this place, as it was nearly on our route, and ere the rays of the sun illumined the horizon we were 'under way.' The country through which we passed was beautiful, with here and there a cluster of buildings, which in better times had bid fair for business, and happiness; but now stand half evacuated, with costly buildings unprepared and uninhabited. The sound of the hammer, and merry whistle of the carpenter had ceased. The mechanic had left his once busy shop for want of employment, and attached himself to farming for a subsistence, or sought a more suitable place for his business. Appearances were much unlike those presented some few years ago, as I passed through the same country. Then all was life, bustle and animation. Now all is changed; but hoary headed Time, that keeps a steady pace onward, let the fute of map be what it may. But why this great change?—there must be a cause. Our childish legions have done what time will scarcely undo.

The day wore away pleasantly. In the afternoon the timber of crooked creek and its tributaries every where met our view; and passing through a delightful prairie with well fenced farms on either side, we came in view of Macedonia. Our beast seemed willing to stop in front of a public house which was by no means the worst in appearance. We were welcomed by our host; our beast being well 'looked after,' we set about taking a walk through 'town,' and imagine our surprise when we found every appearance in contradistinction to what we had been informed. The buildings, (which seemed mostly new) yards, gardens, barns, &c. seemed well constructed, neatly and tastefully arranged. Macedonia is situated in the great bend of crooked creek, surrounded with numerous mills and good farming lands, &c. I was informed the town had been laid out only about three years; that the population is now near 500 and increasing rapidly and that the inhabitants obtained a liberal incorporation from the Legislature at the last session. The place seemed much unlike any in my knowledge. Mechanics of most kinds seemed plenty and busily employed. Every house seemed occupied. A beautiful square lay near the centre of the town, on which we were informed a house for literary and religious purposes was to be erected. We had an agreeable interview with Messrs. Johnsons, Babbitt, Perkins, and others, who seemed to be intelligent and gentlemen. Mr. Babbitt, a younger gentleman, and, I was informed, a professor of law, gave us an interesting and clear epitome of the doctrine and faith of the Mormons, or as they call themselves, Latter Day Saints, which I must confess much disappointed us, as it appeared in a great many respects unobjectionable and altogether quoted from the scriptures. We also were informed of the treatment these people received in Missouri and elsewhere which was sadly at variance with the information we had before received, and if correct throws ignominy, and disgrace beyond description, upon the authorities of Missouri, and their vile persecutors. The night passed mostly in meditation upon the arbitrary cruelties of olden times, and methought I saw the same scene in the blood stained snows of Missouri. The night wore off and we were soon on the road to Nauvoo, passing through quite a distance of handsome and heavy timber. We crossed crooked creek about two miles from the town and came on to the broad prairie of the Mississippi. The prairie here seems about 15 miles wide and as we passed on either hand, showed the work of industry and art. Miles of land are made secure from cattle &c. by means of a handsome ditch and sod fence. Many farms were under a good state of cultivation. Large herds of cattle might be seen in almost every direction on the uncultivated prairie.

A quick drive of a few hours brought us through the eastern portion of the city of Nauvoo, to a very eminent situation on the bluff, at which place a magnificent stone building was in progress of erection; which we at once pronounced the Temple. The majestic Mississippi showed its broad waters and numerous islands, for miles. The far-famed Iowa presented itself beyond in view like a beautiful landscape. The sight is delightful, from a gradual descent of about a mile to the river, an inveterate on either hand, up and down, may be seen with one glance of the eye; covered with buildings of almost every description, from the humble cot to the stately mansion; harmoniously intermingled; all seemed bustle, life and business.

We were invited to the house of an elderly gentleman, who showed us every possible courtesy; and after supper were introduced to Mr. Smith the Prophet. Suffice it to say we were agreeably disappointed in his person, appearance and manners. He seemed to be very sociable and ready in conversation upon any subject. Upon his warm solicitation, we spent the night at his house. The morning was spent in examining some very curious ancient records found with a number of mummies in good preservation, in ancient Thebes. They contain some very curious representations. Several days were very satisfactorily spent in visiting each portion of the city; and I say truth, such another scene of industry, enterprise and good order in society, I never before witnessed. Why these people should be thus basely slandered, belied, and persecuted, is beyond my powers of research. Apparently peaceable with their neighbors, of good morals and industrious; turning the broad prairie into fertile fields, and making an extensive market in the most fertile part of the State.

The cruelties and persecutions heaped upon them in the State of Missouri, in point of barbarity, puts a blush upon the history of the ancient Huns, or persecutions of the Waldenses.

If people at a distance from them would go and see for themselves before believing every idle report concerning them. An innocent and unoffending people would be saved much anxiety and misery.

British trade with America.—It appears from a return just laid before Parliament, that the exports of British goods to the United States of America, in the year 1842, were less in value by the sum of nearly twelve hundred thousand pounds than they were in any previous year since 1833, and that they were less by more than one half than the annual average exports of the nine preceding years; the average yearly exports from 1833 to 1841 (both years inclusive) being the value of £7,000,000, whilst those of 1842 were not of more value than £3,528,807. This decline in the largest branch of the trade of the country is not confined to a few, or even to several articles; out extends to all, with the single exception of tin and tinned plates. It appears, however, that notwithstanding this falling off in the declared value of the goods, there has been an increase in the number of ships and amount of tonnage employed between the two countries since 1833. American shipping have increased from 229,560, to 816,524 tons, and British from 114,200, to 199,745 tons. The following abstract shows the total declared value of exports during the five years:

REVIEW OF THE SAINT LOUIS MARKETS.

RECORDED OFFICE.
St. Louis, Sept. 7, 1843.

Flour.—The market remains in the same inactive state noticed in our last Wednesday's report, and no transactions beyond a few barrels to bakers, or small lots to fill orders, have come under our notice. The receipts have been rather liberal this week, a part of which has gone into store, but the largest portion, together with considerable lots from stores, has been shipped to New Orleans in anticipation of an advance in the market. Country Mills' flour we quote at $3 75 a 4, again remarking that large lots cannot be sold at these figures; and City Mills' at $4 a 50.

Wheat.—Notwithstanding the very liberal receipts during this week, the market maintains a firm aspect, and prices asked when we closed our last report has been obtained. Sales have been made through the week at prices ranging from 62 to 75 cents, according to quality. The last figure is paid for choice lots of old only. This morning a lot of 1700 bushels was taken at 74 cents.

Corn.—There is a better demand existing this week; at the mills they are paying 22 a 23 cents for white, and yellow in good sacks will command 27 a 28 cents, sacks included, for shipment; several lots received this week have been sent forward—there is not much in the market.

Oats.—There is no demand for more than is required to supply the consumption in the city. Sales on the levee and from wagons, are made at from 16 to 18 cents.

Hemp.—The receipts have been quite considerable during the week. Yesterday there was about 240 bales received, about one half of which was re-shipped; one lot of 84 bales, in first rate order, was sold at $282, and two or three small lots at from $2,85 to $3. The demand continues brisk at our figures.

Bacon.—The market for this article has become dull, a very limited demand only existing for choice lots for city use. Sides, clear, we now quote at 3 cents. Ham 3 a 4; Shoulders 2 a 2 1/2 cents. An advance on the price named for hams and shoulders is paid for superior lots city cured, or choice country, cured for family use.

Lard.—There is but a limited demand for this article, particularly for prime, which comes in small lots not worthy the attention of shippers; and there is sufficient in the market to supply the city demand. The market is in better demand. Prime we quote at 4 1/2 a 4 3/4 cents, dull; ordinary, 3 a 3 1/2, in kegs or barrels.

Pork.—There is no demand for pork, and what is sold is at retail; the quotations we give are nominal, say for mess, $8 a $8.50, prime 6 50 a 7.

Sugar.—There has been very little change in the market for some weeks, but recently the price has advanced a shade by dealers in consequence of an advance in New Orleans, and the limited receipts. We quote New Orleans from 6 to 6 1/2 cents for fair and good, and 6 1/2 a 7 cents for prime and choice qualities. There is a very good stock of all qualities in the market.

It has been thought advisable to re-publish the ordinance concerning marriages in the city of Nauvoo. To those who actually mean to honor their God, their country, and their rights, little need be said; they will see that they can save their time and money without going to Carthage for licenses to marry; justly, legally and religiously. Verbum Sat.

AN ORDINANCE CONCERNING MARRIAGES.

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that all male persons over the age of seventeen years, and females over the age of fourteen years, may contract and be joined in marriage; Provided, in all cases where either party is a minor, the consent of parents or guardians be first had.

Sec. 2. Any person as aforesaid, wishing to marry or be joined in marriage, may go before any regular minister of the gospel, mayor, alderman, justice of the peace, judge or other person authorized to solemnize marriages in the state, and celebrate or declare their marriage in such manner and form as shall be most agreeable, either with or without license.

Sec. 3. Any person solemnizing a marriage as aforesaid, shall make return thereof to the city recorder, accompanied by a recording fee of fifty cents, within thirty days of the solemnization thereof; and it is hereby made the duty of the recorder to keep an accurate record of all such marriages. The penalty for a violation of either of the provisions of this ordinance, shall be twenty dollars, to be recovered as other penalties or forfeitures.

Passed February 17, 1842.
JOHN C. BENNETT, Mayor.
JAMES SLOAN, Recorder.

An ordinance to authorize the city constables to execute and enforce the ordinances relating to dogs and beasts, and to build a pound in the city of Nauvoo.

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that from and after the passage of this ordinance, the city constables, and shall be authorized to execute and enforce all ordinances relating to swine and beasts.

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained, that they are, and shall be further authorized to build a suitable pound, to confine any beasts, according to the requirements of said ordinances; and to do which they are and shall be authorized to use any money, (not otherwise appropriated) which may be in the treasury; or they may use the credit of the city to effect the said purpose.

Passed September 18, 1843.

Artificial Ice.—The "Glaciarium or Frozen Lake," now opened to the public, at the Baker street Bazaar, Portman square, is one of the curiosities of the age. The visitor is suddenly introduced amongst regions of seeming frost and snow, and placed in the midst of Alpine scenery. The London Skating Club hold their meetings at the Glaciarium; and from the ease they display in their graceful revolutions in waltzing, &c., it is evident the artificial ice is little inferior to natural ice. The inventor, Mr. Henry Kirk, has lived to see what few inventors rarely accomplish, viz: his efforts carried to perfection; more especially as chemists and scientific men considered the idea as chimerical. In appearance, the artificial ice closely resembles the natural. It is a semi-transparent body of crystal, composed of chemical salts, which, when in a liquid state, is flooded on a prepared level floor, and immediately crystallizes into a beautiful sheet of ice. By this invention, skaters have the necessary means of enjoyment without the dangers and difficulties attending natural ice; but as few pleasures are relished without some anticipated fear, the word dangerous is written conspicuously over a part which appears so, but in reality is only a little pool ingeniously contrived to represent a part of the ice broken, to permit the Alpine cottager to dip for water with a small bucket, which is also frozen. The lovers of skating must hail the artificial ice as a great treat indeed, for by this ingenious invention, whether it be in a warm or cold climate, windy or calm, rain or sunshine, day or night, and it is not improbable that a "frozen lake" will become as general to the mansions of the affluent, as an orchard or a fish-pond. Prince Albert, who has visited the Glaciarium, has, it is said, given orders for one. At the evening meetings, the whole scene is beautifully lighted, the moon rises, the stars glitter, and music enlivens the whole scene, which, as it so richly merits, is thronged by admiring visitors.

Snarling.—For a man to enjoy himself, he must take the world as it is, mixed up with a thousand shades and a thousand spots of sunshine—a cloud here and there—a bright sky—a storm to-day and a calm tomorrow; the chill, piercing winds of autumn, and the bland, reviving breath of summer. He should realize, too, that he is surrounded by individuals of different dispositions and characters, and should take the mass as they are, and not as he fancies they ought to be.—He should look up to heaven in gratitude, for what he enjoys, and not censure God for what he has not granted. Then he will cease fretting and snarling, and not before. If there is one character on this earth who deserves the appellation of fool more than another, it must be that person who continually frets and snarls, and never sees a moment's peace, while surrounded with every thing to please and instruct.—Portland Argus.

Potatoes above Ground.—The Bay-on Sara Ledger mentions the receipt of a present, called, for want of a strictly proper name, the "Vine Potatoe Plant." The improvement of having potatoes grow above ground, so that they can be picked up at leisure, and selected like choice fruit, must strike the most superficial observer. This fruit is a native of South America, and the seed from which the present vines were raised, were brought from England, from which fact it is attracting attention, and will, no doubt, be brought to great perfection. It is prolific beyond any thing of the vegetable species—a single potatoe forming a vine of splendid green foliage, sufficient to cover a good sized arbor.—Hanging to this vine may be seen the fruit in all sorts of fantastic forms, and in all stages of advancement to perfection.

Earthquake.—The Memphis Eagle of the 16th, says: "We were visited last night by one of the severest shocks of an earthquake which we have had for many years, (excepting the one on the 4th of January last.) The shock last night was attended with considerable noise, and is said to have continued nearly a minute." Accounts from other parts of Tennessee mention the occurrence of the same phenomenon in their vicinity.

Earthquake at Somerville, Tennessee.—The Reporter of the 19th says: "We were aroused this morning, between three and four o'clock, by the shock of an earthquake, which lasted about a minute."

An Earthquake at Sea.—Captain Crowell, of the barque Autolian, arrived at Boston, from Cadiz, reports that on the 31st ult., latitude 33, longitude 36, he experienced a severe shock of an earthquake.

An Error of the Press.—An exchange says green horns are plenty in Philadelphia, meaning green corn unquestionably.

A Difficulty Solved. John, why is this dirt not taken away? We have no wagon on the premises. Throwing a ditch at the back of the house and throw it in. But what are we to do with the earth which will be dug out? Pool, don't bother me; make a ditch big enough to put earth, rubbish, and all in.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES

The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPFIRE LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitation of the Heart, Indigestion and nervous affections generally, Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.
This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents), brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

STRAYED FROM THE TEMPLE.

ABOUT two months ago a dark brown Cow, white face, carries her head high, long horned, bright eyes, a white spot on one hind foot, white on the end of the tail, white lag, rather short legs, nine years old last spring, she was expected to calve in a few days when she went away, she is not a very large Cow but pretty stout built.

ALSO, a black Cow, white face, white feet, lower part of tail white, had a dirty red and white band on her horns across her forehead, she was very poor when she went away, gave a little milk, had no calf, rather a small-sized Cow, and about seven years old as near as can be remembered.

Whoever will give information of either or both of the Cows to the Temple Committee or the Temple Recorder, will bring them to the Temple, will do us a favor, and if they desire it a reasonable compensation shall be allowed for trouble and expenses.

The descriptions are as near as can be remembered, but only having them here a little while it may possibly not be exactly correct. WM. CLAYTON,
Temple Recorder.

THE PARTING TEAR.

Oh! a lovely gem is the parting tear,
When friends have met to part,
If cometh from founts as clear as crystal,
The true, confiding heart:
Oh! care hath been cruel and cold, I ween,
And bitter hath been its frost,
To him whose eye is dry at the scene,
The power to weep is lost.
How it gleameth then to the maiden's eye,
The tear of youth's first love,
As she whispers forth the soft "good bye,"
To him who goeth to rove.
How it rusheth down stern Manhood's cheek
And his stanch old heart—
But its pride is bowed, its spirit meek,
When the last hour comes to part.
How it gleameth in the tale of sorrow deep—
Of the heart-strings' severing pain—
How it maketh the heart with joy to leap,
With its tale of meeting again,
In which breath too of hope is bright.
All adding doubts denying—
It gleameth all will yet be light,
Upon true faith relying.
Speaking when no sound we hear,
A thrilling voice hath that parting tear!

Agricultural.

HEAP.

This article is now extensively cultivated in the West, and is destined to become one of the principal articles of production. The soil and climate of the upper Mississippi are well adapted to insure a large growth, and heavy staple. We recently saw a hand of hemp grown in Iowa by a gentleman from Kentucky, that measured eight feet in length. He gives as the result of his experience, the fact that his crops in Iowa have exceeded those raised by him in Kentucky, in quantity and quality the full amount of 20 per cent. We give below the process of water rotting extracted from a recent work upon that subject.

"The hemp after being cut, should lay a few days to wilt, but avoid getting it wet—it injures the color, and creates a loss in the weight of lint, when it has undergone its maceration. No hemp less than five feet should be water rotted. When wilted, it should be immediately placed in stacks near the pools, or in the field. When the farmer is prepared to water-rot, he should assort his hemp and place each size of hemp in the pools, by itself; it produces a more regular rot. The hemp should be pushed clearly into the pool and weighed down with rock, or timber, by laying plank on the points and butts, and the rock or timber on it. It requires in September, five to six days, according to the temperature of the weather;—in October, eight or ten; in November, fourteen to sixteen; and in December, from three to four weeks. To ascertain when the hemp has undergone its solution, there is a roughness on the surface of the bark. By taking out a few stalks from various bundles, it will be found that the roughness has left it, and it will be smooth to the hand. It must be taken out immediately and spread thin on the ground; and when it dries on one side, turn it over; if it gets two or three rains on it it is better, it washes off the gum which is left on the surface, and causes it to clean easier. When perfectly dry, throw it into shecks, or ricks, ready for breaking. It is necessary that they should not apply it too often to the break; it requires more shaking and produces less tow; cleaning the staple well adds greatly to the appearance of the article.

From the American Farmer

BOTTS IN HORSES—MURRAIN IN CATTLE.

It is the duty of every person who has any experience in the treatment of diseases in that noble and useful animal, the horse, to communicate it to the public.
It was my province a few years since to have much to do with that noble animal, and of course among the numbers in my possession, I would find a number that would be diseased, and very often my experience would be taxed to find a remedy for some of the diseases to which they would be very often subject.
The most formidable disease to which this noble and useful animal is addicted, and there is none more alarming in its attacks, is the bots.
I had consulted the highest authorities in the veterinary art for the treatment of this disease, and faithfully used the remedies laid down, without any benefit. I was induced from interest, and also for the very high regard which that noble animal, the horse, held in my estimation, to use every expedient in my possession to cure this formidable disease. I had another motive—I had lost several very fine horses by this disease, which induced me to use and try every expedient which my ingenuity could invent, to arrest this disease among my horses, and prevent, if possible, its recurrence among them.

I am satisfied, and feel convinced, that I will offer to the public, an infallible remedy for the bots.
Some six years since, I purchased a very fine horse, but he had the appearance of laboring under some disease. I commenced a course of treatment, which I thought would relieve him, and which I had pursued in the treatment of some other horses which had the appearance of being diseased in a similar manner to the above mentioned horse, with decided relief; but in this case all my remedies failed of their desired effect.

I was induced to try the use of lime in the treatment of this case, as I was confident he was filled with grubs or bots, as he had discharged several. I commenced by giving him a table spoonful of slacked lime three times per week, in bread mash. After pursuing this course near two weeks, the bots began to pass off in quantities varying from ten to twenty, which he would expel during the night, from his intestines. In the meantime his appetite began to improve; and in six weeks he was one of the finest looking geldings I ever saw. From that day to this, I have kept up the use of lime among my horses with decided benefit. As an evidence of its good effects, I have not lost a horse since I began to use it.

A large number of the bots which he would expel from his intestines, had the appearance of being dead. I was induced from this fact, to put some of them in a strong solution of lime-water; as I had frequently put them in spirits of turpentine, without producing an effect on them, but all those that I put into lime were perfectly dead in eight or forty hours.

Lime is a certain preventive in keeping cattle from taking the murrain. As an evidence of this fact, I have used it among my cattle three times per week, mixed with salt, for three or four years. In that time I have not lost a single cow or steer, or ox, by this disease; in the meantime, some of my neighbors have lost nearly all the cattle they owned.

I will give you a stronger cue than the one above mentioned. One of my neighbors who lost all his cattle, had a neighbor living within two hundred yards of him, who had several cattle which ran daily with those that died, and his cattle all escaped. He informed me that he made it an invariable rule to give his cattle salt and lime every morning.

I have no doubt it is a sure and infallible remedy for bots in horses, and a preventive of murrain among cattle.

SPAIN.

The contest for the possession of power in Spain has terminated abruptly in favor of the revolutionists, and Espartero who, two or three weeks ago, held sovereign power undisturbed, is now an exile on board a British ship of war.
In consequence of this unexpected overturn having been effected by the joint efforts of the supporters of despotism and republicanism, it is not to be expected that the parties will harmonize; and accordingly rumors are current that dissatisfaction and difference of opinion already prevail in the councils at Madrid to a great extent, and it seems no way improbable that Espartero may be recalled in a short time to allay the disturbances that will take place.

In the unsettled state of government, in the destructive wars, and unceasing commotions which have prevailed in Spain for the last forty years, we have set before us in modern times an instance of the evil consequences which have occurred at different periods of our own history, when the regular succession to the supreme power was disturbed. The wars of England during the contest between the house of York and Lancaster, the long war of liberty in Scotland, from the death of Alexander III. till the consolidation of the government by King Robert Bruce, and the destructive civil wars which attended the minority of the successive members of the Stewart family who ascended the Throne, were a state of things similar to those in Spain, where life and property have so long been wretchedly sacrificed, in the contentions of one ambitious faction to pull the reins of government from the other; while none of them have had the most distant intention of benefiting their country, or improving the condition of its inhabitants.

Espartero's government, whatever might be its merits or demerits, was at least clearly in the interest of England, and strongly inclined to improve the commercial relations between England and Spain. We have, therefore, a strong indication of the tening of the Peel ministry towards despotism, or of its apathy to the interest of their country by its thus amply submitting to the overthrow of a government which had previously read so much British blood and treasure to establish. When the Melbourne cabinet gave active assistance to Espartero in his efforts to expel Don Carlos and absolutism from Spain; whatever might be thought of that policy by the people at large, the Tories, at least, gave a silent approval to every step which was taken, and now after the people of this country have seen so much of the fruits of their industry squandered in arms and ammunition, to set up a "friendly government" in Spain by one cabinet, in half a dozen years afterwards, they see another cabinet succeed which stands silently by allowing these efforts to be overturned, and the most bitter opponents of their nation invested with authority which is certain to be exercised detrimental to its interests. Whether it be Christians or Republicans, that obtain the predominance in Spain, is to this country, in a national point of view, a matter of no consequence. Both of the parties detest England alike heartily, and there can be no doubt, but every act that can injure the commercial interests of England will be actively enforced.—Glasgow Paper.

From the London Morning Chronicle.
Letters from Barcelona of the 4th announce that the Junta of that town is in a state of open hostility with the Provincial Government of Madrid. It has refused to obey the orders which have been given by the Lopez cabinet, to suspend the demolition of the ramparts of the town, and has given orders that their destruction shall be completed.

Brigadier Castro, who has refused rank and employment, is preparing to leave Barcelona. The director of the Prosperidad, Milá de la Roca, has been drawn out of the citadel, and has embarked for nobody knows where. Many families are emigrating from fear of assassination. The Governor of the island, Moreno de la Pina, has given in his resignation. The English steam-boat, the Locust, arrived at Barcelona on the 4th, and left again the same day for the Gibraltar station, where she will replace the Lizard.

Letters from Saragossa of the 4th inform us that Arragon is inclined to follow the example of Barcelona. A provisional Junta has formed itself at Carinena for all Arragon. The Deputy Ortega has been appointed president of it, and had been installed on the 3d, at Almona. Ortega has also been appointed commandant of all the forces in High Arragon.

Generals Concha and Figueras have been promoted to the rank of lieutenant-generals. The former is appointed inspector-general of infantry, and the latter inspector-general of the militia and captain-general of Seville.

General Concha entered Cadiz on the 31st. At that time the Malabar was still in the bay, having Espartero, who was ill, on board.

From the London Times.

STATE OF WALES.

Our reports from Wales continue to be as discouraging as ever. A twofold insurrection is still raging there; the one threatens life and property, and is daily assuming a more formidable character; the other is as yet nothing more than a strike of coppermen for wages. The latter has nothing of itself to excite alarm, but viewed in conjunction with the other, it, if continued, becomes dangerous. When it is recollected that last year the Chartist riots originated in a strike for wages, at the same time and near the same places which are witnessing outrages of the most violent kind, will communicate the spirit of disaffection from one part of the principality to the other.

REBECCA AND HER DAUGHTERS.
Notwithstanding the pressure of Horse, Foot, and Dragons in Carmarthen and counties contiguous—notwithstanding the Rural Police that are to be, and the presence of a Bow Street Magistrate, and the Solicitor of the Treasury, Rebecca still persists in her gate smashing principle—defying Magistrates, Constabulary, and Proclamations. That she will succeed in all her objects is not to be expected—but in some she will succeed, and in fact, she already has succeeded. The system of gross robbery and fraud practised by the Carmarthen gentry in creeping incomes for themselves, by multiplying in all possible vexatious forms, the nuisance of Tolls, is likely to receive a blow from which it will not speedily recover, if ever.

Until we read of the policements of the Welsh Anazao, we had not the least notion of the manifold impressions of the Rich upon the Poor in the county of Carmarthen, and we doubt not other counties in the Principality. Why, then, Welsh Landlords are really as clever as our Grand Jury Jobbers used to be. And this is loyal Wales—this amongst the Protestants of Ancient Britain. Your Welsh gentlemen, indeed! Why, they

as far as we can spell them out, to be about as shameless, as heartless, as unprincipled a set of oppressors as ever raised a country. But not one word of their misdeeds would be heard of but for the curious insurrection, the incidents of which we have for some time been recording. This robbery would have been still in the process of perpetration, if Rebecca did not take it into her head to smash all the turnpike gates in a country. She is a very a naughty woman—that's a truth—but blessings on her handy work! She has lifted up the veil that shrouded the deeds of her gentlemanlike materialists. She has shown what manner of treatment the poor farmers and workmen are subjected to at the hands of people who call themselves their superiors.

But it is not the toll nuisance alone that the Welsh farmers will have abolished. Our life for it, they will not cry halt until they fix the title on the landlords' shoulders. But then we shall be told the Welsh landlords will enhance their rents. Not so fast, if you please. The present rents cannot be paid. And it is useless—absolutely useless—prices of farming produce ruling as they do—to increase the rents of Wales. It is screwed to the famine pitch. Notwithstanding the efforts of a rural population to grasp at funds for the purpose of existence, the reprobate landlordry by and which no landlord can pass. There is no blood in the turnip. And we have not the least doubt that the Fifty of Nature, of which the Welsh Farmers have already been speaking, will be heard of sooner or later; only in Carmarthen, but in Buckinghamshire and Dorset.

It is a remarkable thing—the Welsh insurrection, altogether. It tells a tale of the frightful gulf between the upper and the lower Orders of Society. Hated is the principle that prevails—dread and vindictive hatred. But is this ruin of Wales only? Into how many counties of England has the demon passion entered? Where is the county in which it may not be found?

This is the Sign. Would to God the People and their Rulers may read it rightly, before it be too late.—Dublin Evening Post.

THE WEATHER AND CROPS.

The continuation of alternate days of sunshine and rain, which we have had for a month past, has in the early part of this week given place to apparently settled warm weather, which, if it continues for two weeks or so, will place us in the busy season of an abundant harvest. Owing to the dropping rain of the last few weeks having been constantly accompanied by full summer heat, though not ripening rapidly, the crops were all the while making considerable progress towards maturity, and while the grain has been kept a little back thereby, the green crops have been rendered both abundant and early. To-day the sun is very strong, and the wheat is fast assuming the golden hue. The heavy hands of oats too, supported by a long and powerful stalk, are fast whitening to maturity, and although the wheat may be a week or ten days later than we have seen it, the oats are likely to be ready about the same time, which will make that crop early. In this district of the country we have never seen the fields teeming with a more abundant crop of everything necessary for the food of man and beast; and all that is necessary is a continuance of the present fine weather to bring the fruits of the earth to maturity.—Glasgow Paper.

RECEPTION OF JAMES GORDON BENNETT BY THE REPEALERS.

At a Repeal meeting at Dublin on the 7th, a person who had for some time been sitting beside Mr. O'Connell addressed Mr. Steele and handing him his card, requested an introduction to Mr. O'Connell. Mr. Steele accordingly presented the card, and informed that Mr. James Gordon Bennett, of New York, was present. Mr. O'Connell replied, "He is a person with whom I can have nothing to do; he is the Editor of the New York Herald, one of the most infamous gazettes ever printed, and I shall have nothing to say to him." This, says the reporter, was a reception that Mr. Bennett did not count upon, and he forthwith proceeded to make his departure. The room being very full, his movement was much retarded; but by the aid of the Chairman, he struggled out, amid the groans of the meeting. Mr. O'Connell observed at this meeting that as some of the papers were already discussing his plan of a "conciliatory assembly," he would remark that he had not yet decided what his plan should be; but he pledged himself to bring forward one before the end of the present year that should be in strict accordance with the laws. This "rem" was not to be announced until the 8th.

WEDD'S LETTERS FROM ABOARD.

London, July 18.
Bank of England Described.—We availed ourselves this morning of the permission obtained by Mr. Wiggin, to visit the Bank of England. An official (Master or Usher) with laced dress coat and three cornered hat, escorted us leisurely through an institution that is so potent in controlling and regulating the money pulsations of Europe. It is situated on Threadneedle street, but fronts upon half a dozen others, and occupies an irregular area of eight acres. There are no windows through the exterior of the building, light being supplied by skylights and open courts within. There is a clock, by which Bank time is kept, with dials indicating the time in sixteen different offices. The Bank with its various offices are open from 9 a. m. till 5 p. m. The Bank has its Printing office, Book-binding, engraving offices, &c. &c. Checks, blank books, &c. &c., are all printed within the Bank, as are the Bank Notes. In the room where the circulating notes are printed, there are eight presses, all constantly employed, and which throw off about 8000 impressions daily.

We saw two presses rolling off five pound notes, and others upon the various denominations up to £1000, which is the largest note the bank issues. The dates and numbers of the notes are supplied by smaller presses in another room. The paper is delivered to the presses counted (a hundred sheets at a time) and when worked and returned, another hundred sheets are given. Pressmen work five hours and a half from two to three o'clock a week. In the office where redeemed notes are examined, cancelled, &c. 135 clerks are constantly employed. When we entered this room our attendant was sharply reprimanded for bringing strangers there, but on being informed that it was the Governor's order, we were allowed to pass. Forty thousand different notes are frequently sent to this office, to be cancelled in a day.

The bank you know never re-issues a note. When returned to the counter for payment, a note is cancelled, filed away, to be burnt at the expiration of ten years. The armory of the Bank contains an hundred stand of muskets, with pistols, cutlasses, hand grenades, &c. &c., and has a night guard of 35 strong. In the office where the bank notes are counted into parcels, God with wine and laid in pigeon holes, we found five staid, methodical, matter-of-fact looking clerks, whom you would trust for their faces. One of these old chaps, with the precision of "old Owen" and the good nature of "Tim Linkenwater," took his keys and unlocked the depositories of paper wealth. The "bags" of each denomination were in separate parcels. When we came to the "high number" he placed four packages in my hand, and remarked, "You now hold £4,000,000 sterling in your hand, sir. Yes, I was actually in possession of twenty millions of dollars, a sum much larger than the whole estate of John Jacob Astor! But it all returned to its pigeon hole, and left me a happier man than those who are encumbered with overgrown fortunes.

Another of the old clerks opened the golden dormitories, where repose an endless number of bags, each containing 800 sovereigns. We were next and finally conducted to a subterranean region, encircled by gold and silver bullion. Here bars of the precious metal were as plentifully heaped as those of iron and steel are in the stores of our friends Benedict, Townsend and Corning.—The silver we did not meddle with, but we handled bars of Gold, each weighing eight thousand pounds sterling, that were piled in barrow loads of seventy thousand pounds sterling each. Much of this bullion was recently received from China as an instalment upon the sum John Bull makes the Celestials pay for their opium into refusal to take opium. The Bank of England has now in paper and specie nearly eight millions of pounds sterling. There are eight hundred persons, in its various departments, constantly employed within its walls.

EDUCATION.

Mr. Editor:—No estimate can be made upon the worth of education; yet there are kinds of learning that bear the name of education, which full far short of meriting the appellation. As to what constitutes a correct education, we have our peculiar predilections.

Adorn a man with all the artificial knowledge that ever embellished the minds of the most illustrious, so that he will be able to throw over his path through life all those captivating charms that are calculated to win the friendship of the world, and bow it before the shrine of his machinations;—that he can throw over the learned page the bright sunshine of science, soar to the heavens and traverse the airy path of the sky—winding through a boundless maze of unvisited space—and read the mysteries of the unnumbered luminaries of the aerial constellations,—extract Nature's hidden treasures

ures from the bowels of the earth, to enrich a Republic or adorn the Thrones of Kings—that he can dive into the lowest recesses of the eternal deep, and draw sublime morals from its dark and watery chambers,—describe the wide domain of Ocean, as it thunders at the base of some rock-studded promontory, and mingles its fur-off roar of mountain waves with the deep monotony of the maddening tempest,—still he may lack a correct education.—Though his literary beauties be as lofty and sublime as Virgil's, and his Muse sing as melodious as Milton's, Ponce's, and others of the departed literati,—though his brow be garlanded with academic honors and festooned by the bestowd polish of refined Alma Mater,—though his ear tell of dilapidated empires,—of nations slumbering in ruin—mouldering monuments and crumbling tombs—of antique columns, rising in aged dignity to the skies, as it brooding over the decomposing relics of departed greatness, that he strewn over a wide domain of ruin, once the seat of luxury and national opulence,—though he can, by dint of genius, merge into the primitive forests of our native America, and tell posterity of the wonders which Nature's Great Artificer created there in the gladsome morn of primeval Time,—though he dwell upon its romantic scenery, towering mountains, quiet vales and star-lit dells,—its murmuring rivers, purling brooks and far-leaping waterfalls,—still, still he may not possess a correct education.

When we speak of incorrect education, we allude to that kind of education that delineates the mind to the reign of bigotry—closes up the avenues to reason—throws over the mind the impenetrable veil of superstition—makes the intellect the paupered slave of an insatiable ambition, and crushes everything that is liberal, patriotic, noble, lofty and generous in the human family. We are an advocate of education; but of a different kind from that which raises over the heads of freemen an aristocratical oligarchy, and fills our world with sordid arrogance and hand-box flattery. The world is drinking too deeply of the waters of pride at the present day. Men have quaffed the sparkling waters of the golden goblet, until they have become too arrogant and supercilious to bow to the broad light of truth, when its lustre is reflected upon them, and whenever we wish to converse with them, the great barrier that their prejudice and traditional predilections instantly erect between us, renders a pursuit to their reason wholly inaccessible. This has resulted from being educated in schools of ancestral traditions, where the mind has imbibed all the fallacious dogmas of modern theology. This should not be the case. The mind, to reason logically upon any subject, should be wholly divested of prejudice and pre-entertained notions. Every channel to reason should be unobstructed and the mind presented before the great mirror of Truth, open to conviction—whenever incontrovertible evidences are presented. If it be different from this, we might as well attempt to hold converse with any species of the brute creation, or make our voice penetrate the impenetrable rock and bring it to understanding. Nature, when the air is rent by the roar of ten-thousand cannon, try to hear the unwritten song of the babbling rill that leaps at the immense foot of some thundering cataract, and you will derive as much consolation as by arguing with a mind where reason holds no empire. In the great school of learned ethics, and amid all the panorama of theoretical knowledge—the mind is too apt to become warped in favor of some apparently plausible principle, which when it is divested of the sophisms with which it is supported, and tried by the great standard of unvarnished truth, will appear a glaring dogma, the whole fabric of which will fall with a ruinous crash to the dust. The ductile mind, unguarded as it generally is, is too apt to mistake a rhetorical display of sophisticated reasoning, for that which is sound and logical. Thus the student is beguiled along by the beauty of diction and elegance of scholastic style, until he is bewildered; and, overwhelmed by an avalanche of dogmas, he cannot call reason enough to his aid to discriminate between sophistical and sound arguments. By degrees he becomes so warm in his panegyric of favorite authorities, that they are readily set down as orthodox—with all their sophisms and shallow reason,—and if any person presumes to advance any argument that does not harmonize with the lore displayed in the volumes, they are set down as fabulous, without taking them into consideration for a moment. Thus the mind grows gradually up into a false education—an education that will sweep away everything that is correct, sound and permanent from the mind and close its doors against the ingress of every principle that is not found upon the pages of his favorite author; so completely is he

This kind of education we disapprove; but are in favor of an education that will embrace a principle of truth as quick from Tom Paine, Baron Monchaillon, Robinson Crusoe, or Sinbad the sailor; as it would from the most learned writer in metaphysics. Not that we would advocate the reading of improper or immoral books;—we only make this remark to illustrate our position:—that truth ought to be embraced and a good principle inculcated wherever it may be found. Is not a diamond of much value found in a Hovel, as it would be if found in a Palace? Is not a good principle equally as good couched in an Almanac as the same principle would be if read from the pages of Holy Writ?—Certainly it is; yet we very much question whether some men of the present age,—educated in schools of modern theology,—where metaphysical dogmas are invented by dint of some literary legend,—would not run half a mile to procure the work of some popular commentator, when the identical article desired might be found upon the shelf, extracted into Webster's Spelling Book! This kind of false education we abhor. In short, we are in favor of that kind of education that will “Try all things, hear all things, prove all things, and hold fast that which is good”—that will weigh every principle, hear every argument and embrace only those which are genuine.

Foreign News.

[From the N. Y. Tribune.]

TEN DAYS LATER FROM EUROPE.

The steamship Britannia, Capt. Hewitt, arrived at Boston on Sunday morning, with dates from Liverpool to the afternoon of the 19th, and London to the 18th. On the arrival of the Express of Messrs. Harnden & Co. we issued an Extra with a full summary of the news. The markets generally seem to have improved. Among the arrivals we observe the name of Horley Palmer, Esq., late Governor of the Bank of England. Mr. J. W. Wallack, and Capt. W. A. Spencer and Com. B. C. Low, of the U. S. N.

Parliament has been unusually busy in discussing and acting upon various questions of interest. In the debate on Irish affairs Lord Brougham spoke of the speeches of “a person named Tyler said to be the son of the Accidental President of the United States”—but passed them over by saying that “no one was answerable for the fooleries—the excessive fooleries, of his family.” He refused to believe that President Tyler was the author of the Repeal letter published over his name. A spirited debate was had upon the Washington Treaty as connected with the surrender of fugitive slaves. The Attorney General gave his opinion that they could not be surrendered. Lord Palmerston made a very able speech on the affairs of Serbia in which he wove a fierce assault on the Government. Mr. D'Israeli followed in the same strain, and took the house by surprise with a speech of great ability and independence. In the debates upon the state of Irish affairs the do nothing policy of the Government has been attacked with great bitterness.

Parliament was to be prorogued by the Queen in person on the 24th ult.

The steamship Caladonia, Capt. Lott, from Boston, arrived at Liverpool on the 24th.

During the week previous to the sailing of the Britannia, the underwriters at Lloyd's had received accounts containing information of twelve melancholy shipwrecks, attended with a very serious loss of human life.

A turn out of the operatives at Ashton under Lyne, near Manchester, had occurred—but was followed by no serious results.

In Wales, the disturbances still continue. Some concession has been made to the demands of the disaffected, but this seems only to increase the discontent.

In Ireland, the Repeal agitation continues with unabated zeal and success. The greatest gathering that has yet been held took place on Tara Hill, a place remarkable in Irish history, on the festival of the Assumption. A most spirited and interesting account of this great demonstration will be found in the letter of our special correspondent in another column. The accounts given of this great meeting in all the papers represent it as having possessed the deepest and most momentous interest.

Mr. Dennis John Blake, recently dismissed from the Customs, has been arrested on a charge of having defrauded the government to the amount of $320,000. He had recently retired to a fine estate in Dublin.

Letters have been received by O'Connell and read at the Repeal meetings, from sympathizers in France, offering aid and shelter if it shall be needed to the Repealers of Ireland.

The dismissal of Justices still continues.

A riot occurred at a fair near Galway on the 1st ult. Two persons were killed by the firing of the police, and several others were badly wounded.

Mr. Hogan, the Irish sculptor, has been engaged to furnish a statue of O'Connell, to be placed in Conciliation Hall.

In Scotland the August Commissioners of the established Church voted 61 to 33 to approve Lord Aberdeen's bill as it stands. Rev. Dr. Cunningham, late Minister of Trinity College at Edinburgh, had preached his farewell sermon previous to coming to America to examine our literary and educational institutions.

From France, the news is of little interest. Queen Christina is still busy in striving to recover power in Spain, and rumors of the marriage of her daughter are still rife. The French have established a camp on the frontiers of Tunis to watch the movements of the tribes of that regency.

In Spain the junta of Barcelona is in open hostility with the Provisional Government of Madrid. The Governor of the Citadel has resigned. Subsequent accounts, however, state that the junta have submitted. Espartero has issued a proclamation declaring that he has been shamefully abandoned by his friends, and has thus been forced to seek refuge in a foreign country. He arrived at Lisbon on the 7th ult., but had not obtained permission to disembark. He had the shore sailed for England.

SPAIN.

The latest accounts from Spain enirely supersede the interest of those received during the early part of the week. Madrid has fallen into the power of Narvaez; the only force on which Espartero could rely for maintaining his authority has joined the insurgents; and he is himself to all intents and purposes a fugitive.

These events have occurred with such astonishing rapidity that it is not easy to follow them. When our short summary of events was drawn up last week, Madrid was firmly held for the Regent, and the summons of Aspiroz, who encamped before it with 5000 men, treated with indignation scorn. On the 15th, according to preconceived arrangements, Aspiroz was joined by Narvaez with 5 or 6000 additional troops. But this circumstance failed to excite consternation in the city, as it was known that a fine army devoted to the Regent's cause, was advancing in pursuit of Narvaez, commanded by Zurabano and Seoane. This force was represented as composed of 15,000 men, and as animated with enthusiastic ardor for the Regent's service. The corps diplomatique, however, at Madrid, took the alarm, and on Narvaez summoning the city to surrender, anxious consultations were held by the Ministers of the courts they represented as to the course to be pursued. Mendizabal, who in the Regent's absence took the chief lead of affairs, declared that he would defend the capital to the last—that when the walls were gone, the streets should be barricaded—and that when these were carried the remnants of the Regent's friends should fight sword in hand though the enemy, bearing the young Queen in the midst of them. The last private account from Madrid represented the inhabitants as full of zeal for the cause of Espartero, and full of hope that the division of Zurabano and Seoane would either defeat the insurgent forces, or compel them to withdraw. It was thought probable that Espartero might yet, on a more regain the ascendancy, and by a rapid march on the capital effect a junction with Seoane's division, and resume the offensive. These expectations were destined to be suddenly blighted by the receipt of the subjoined telegraphic despatch, the authenticity of which was at first doubted, though, as it would appear, without any good ground. It announces the entire destruction of the Regent's cause:

“Madrid, July 23.

The troops of Narvaez and Seoane encountered each other yesterday at Torroa, and after an engagement of about a quarter of an hour the soldiers of both armies fraternized. Seoane and the son of Zurabano were taken prisoners. Zurabano made his escape, and concealed himself in Madrid.

We are assured that the municipality is going out at this moment to surrender Madrid unconditionally.

The military are returning to their homes.

The troops of Enna, which pronounced themselves in possession of the posts, I am informed that Narvaez or Aspiroz will enter Madrid at five o'clock with his division.”

The last accounts from the Regent are dated the 16th instant. He was then at Cordova with 1200 infantry and 600 cavalry. It is presumed he meditated an escape into Portugal. The last advice speak of the probability of the return to Madrid of Christina.

Brigadier Ametller was at Fraga on the 22d, marching upon Saragossa, with 300 men and eight pieces of artillery.

Our private letters from Saragossa of the 22d, state that Ortega had not more than 1200 men under his orders. A column of 600 National Guards, together with a battalion of the Regiment of Huasca, and two pieces of artillery, marched out, dislodged the insurgents from all their positions, pursuing them to the distance of a league from the city, killing 20 and wounding 35. 120 soldiers of Ortega's force passed over to the National Guard of Saragossa.

A reaction in favor of the progressists cause took place at Barcelona on the 21st inst. The National Guards, who wished to depose the patriotic Junta, were arrested and imprisoned in the citadel.

It is reported that the Regent had resigned, that the Cortes were convoked, the Lopez Cabinet installed, and that M. Salvandi and Queen Christina were preparing to leave for Madrid.

THE RIOTS IN WALES.

Swansea, July 25.

On Saturday night a policeman of Swansea happened to meet a man, named John Jones, of Llettyfult, drinking at a public house in Swansea. After some time the man made use of some observations which led the policeman to believe that he had been a participant in some of the Rebecca movements. This induced the policeman to question him, and at length he admitted that he had been present at the destruction of three gates, viz: the Bolgoed, Pontydawe, and Llangavallloch, and that he could identify the parties concerned. On hearing this, the policeman took him in charge, when the mayor being sent for, he underwent a rigid examination, and gave the names of about forty persons, most of them highly respectable farmers, &c., residing near Pontydawe and Llangavallloch. Warrants were then granted, and at twelve o'clock on Saturday night, Captain Napier, superintendent of the county police, late of the Rifles, with Inspector Rees and two other policemen, left Swansea and proceeded to the hills, where they succeeded in capturing two persons quietly, and brought them into Swansea; they then apprehended a third prisoner, whom they left in the charge of the two policemen, while Captain Napier and Rees went into the house of a farmer named Morgan to arrest the son. They had not been in the house a minute before the farmer's wife threw a saucepan of boiling water over the captain, which scalded his shoulders, and then attacked him with the saucepan with which she beat him about the head, and the son, John Morgan, a very powerful young man, having seized a sickle, also attacked Captain Napier with it, and wounded him on the hand. A desperate struggle ensued, and Captain Napier drew one of his pistols, which was not cocked, the hammer being down, for units for Napier, for Morgan immediately grasped his wrist, and turning the muzzle of the pistol to Captain Napier's breast, pulled the trigger, but without effect. Finding his life in danger, Captain Napier immediately drew his other pistol and fired, and shot John Morgan, the ball entering the abdomen; the man, however, having recoiled a few paces and felt the wound, immediately renewed the struggle with increased desperation, but the noise of the pistol having alarmed the policeman outside, they rushed into the house, where they found Captain Napier covered with blood, and succeeded in rescuing him and securing the prisoner, who was brought into Swansea and conveyed to the infirmary in the jail, where he was examined by Dr. Bird, who found that the ball had entered just above the groin, glanced upwards, striking the upper edge of the ilium, and lodged itself in the back between the second and third ribs, from which place Dr. Bird succeeded in extracting it.

On Sunday, in the middle of the day, the police, accompanied by the Mayor and two other magistrates, and thirty men of the Granadier Company of the 75th Regiment of Foot, again proceeded to Llangavallloch, and apprehended Mrs. Morgan, the farmer's wife, and her daughter, and in the course of the evening apprehended Mr. Vaughan, the postmaster and innkeeper of Pontydawe. This morning, and indeed throughout the day, the town of Swansea has been in a state of excitement, crowds of people filling the streets, particularly opposite the station house, where the prisoners were confined, and which was guarded by the 75th Foot, and almost an entire stop being put to business.

Ten prisoners had by this time been brought in.

At nine o'clock a large meeting of the insurgents was held at the Town Hall. Sir John Morris in the chair; and the prisoners being brought down, I applied for admission, but was told that no one could be admitted until the final hearing.

The magistrates sat in deliberation the whole day, and at the close the prisoners were remanded.

The wounded man, last night, when I enquired, was doing well.

The utmost excitement still prevails.

On Tuesday the magistrates proceeded to the hearing of the charges, when the Morgan family were placed at the bar. After hearing the charges, the prisoners were committed for trial; a notification was, however, made that they would be admitted to bail in L. 200 each, and two sureties each in L. 100.

The wounded man is going on favorably.

THE WAR OF INDEPENDENCE IN GREAT BRITAIN.

The punishment of national transgression may be often slow, but it is ever certain. Retributive justice, sooner or later, avenges the wronged, and punishes upon the oppressor the full value of his wrath. The iniquities of Great Britain are soon to be visited upon her. She has already passed that epoch of “perilous greatness” which proved so fatal to the favored nations of antiquity, and from this centre to the extremity of her vast dominions, the premonitory symptoms of rapidly approaching dissolution, are intelligible to the most inexperienced observer of passing events.

Since the achievement of America in independence, the growth of republican principles on the soil of the old world has been rapid—irresistible. In Great Britain, Catholic emancipation—the Repeal of the Test Act—the Reform Bill—the curtailment of the Irish Church Establishment—have been all splendid popular victories, each in its turn giving a new impetus to the progress of liberty, and strengthening the people in the great business of working out their independence. Nothing, however, more strikingly evinces the gigantic power into which the cause of justice and freedom has sprung, under the very shadow of the greatest monarchy on the earth, than the present Repeal agitation in Ireland. Hitherto the struggles of the oppressed people of that island were but the spasmodic twitches of hopeless servitude. Never altogether subdued, it is true, but efficient only in keeping alive the knowledge of the melancholy truth, that the iron hoof of a despotic, iniquitous government was crushing its victims. But very different is the struggle now. The language of complaint, has given place to the bold, indignant remonstrance, and open, fearless, not-to-be-despised demands for redress. The aspect of the Irish nation in the form of time excited sympathy and pity—now, admiration and awe. And surely there can hardly be presented a spectacle of greater sublimity than that of a whole nation standing in the face of heaven and of man, appealing to the universal sense of justice for the redress of centuries of unmitigated wrong, and avowing their fixed determination to be free amongst the nations of the earth.

What is the present state of the Repeal agitation? Crowned with a degree of success which the most sanguine patriot could never have anticipated. Gathering force and influence as it has proceeded, it has expanded from the streamlet which tumbled from its source among the hills, into the broad restless river which pays tribute to the sea. Every week thousands are poured into the treasury of “the association”—the flame of patriotic illumination every hamlet and every cabin—the armed forces which the British government have poured into the country, have caught the enthusiasm, and cheer the “Liberator,” as he passes through their midst—the Premier is paralyzed—the “Iron Duke,” now in the days of his courage, adds fuel to the fire by threatening preparations—the tythe system totters to its fall—every thing betokens the near approach of a most important revolution.

The influence of the Irish agitation on the other portion of the British empire obviously must be immense. The seeds of disorganization are springing up all over the land. The conflict between the few and the many has fairly begun. There can be no doubt about the issue.

By the next arrival from Europe, we expect to receive a lengthened communication from Mr. Bennett, having particular reference to the progress and present prospects of the Repeal movement, and the condition of Britain generally. We shall then be in possession of a cool, calm, dispassionate, and just view of the whole matter. An opportunity will thus be afforded us of recurring to this subject, which now engrosses so much public attention on both sides of the Atlantic. Meantime, we repeat the expression of our desires for the emancipation of Ireland from the servitude to which she has been so long subjected. We trust that the time is rapidly approaching when the possession of liberty, of free institutions, good government, and moral and intellectual enlightenment, will elevate her to the highest rank in the scale of nations, and give her some resemblance to that highly favored description of the poet:—

Far wealth and lies an isle of ancient fame,
By Nature blessed—Liberty is her name.
With gems her water, and her air with health;
Her waving furrows float with yellow corn,
And arms and arts her faithful sons adorn.

[From the New York Herald.]

THE RECENT REVOLUTION IN THE CHURCH OF SCOTLAND.

The secession of upwards of five hundred ministers with their congregations, from the established church of Scotland, is one of the most remarkable signs of the times, and as may readily be supposed, has excited universal interest on the other side of the Atlantic. It is the first decisive blow against that cursed union of church and state, which has been cemented by the blood of an army of martyrs to the truth and liberty, and been one of the chiefest obstacles to the advancement of freedom in the mother country. More, perhaps, than any other event of the day, has it struck terror to the hearts of the supporters of the oppressive institutions of Britain. It has well prepared the way for the annihilation of the iniquitous church establishment in Ireland, which has for so long a period been the prolific source of discord and bloodshed.

Every incident in this great movement is interesting to the friends of human liberty, and the deliverance of religion from secular bondage, all the world over. We rejoice much to find that the calls of the emancipated churches for aid, have met with such cordial and general response. The people of Scotland have already contributed $300,000, the city of London upwards of $50,000, the North of Ireland $40,000, and almost all the continental reformed churches have testified their sympathy in an equally substantial and efficient manner. Numerous acts of individual munificence to an extraordinary extent, evince the remarkable enthusiasm which exists. In our own city the feeling amongst our Scottish fellow-citizens is very ardent. James Lennox and John Johnstone, merchants of great wealth and respectability, have each contributed the sum of $2,500, and other instances of great liberality might be mentioned.

All this is very gratifying. We cannot but rejoice in the destruction of systems of iniquity, by law established, and in the re-organization of one of the most important churches of Christendom, we would fain perceive the harbinger of a better day, when Christians of different denominations will live in harmony, no longer disgrace humanity and their faith by bigotry, intolerance, and fanatic hatred of each other.

THE ALBION BALLOON: AERIAL VOYAGE TO THE CONTINENT.—On Friday morning last Mr. Charles Green, jun., made an ascent in his new balloon, called the Albion, with the determination of proceeding to the continent. The ascent was made from the grounds of the Commercial Gas-works, at the World's-end bridge, Stepney. The gas used on the occasion was manufactured expressly for the purpose. The balloon was inflated through a pipe about six inches in diameter; and, though it is capable of holding 25,000 cubic feet of gas, it was filled in an hour. During the time occupied by the inflation, Mr. Green and Mr. Alfred Bradley, who was to accompany him on the intended trip, together with the directors, partook of a cold collation. The moment it was announced that all was ready, Messrs. Green and Bradley, after partaking of a purring glass, stepped into the car in high spirits. Mr. Green, having arranged the economy for the management of the machine, gave the word “Let go,” and the ropes being cut away from the car, the balloon rose gradually and majestically, amidst the cheers of the assembled crowd on side. It ascended steadily to a considerable height, where it remained apparently stationary for some minutes. Mr. Green, at his adventurous companion being seen waving their flags. It then crossed the Thames, and took a direction towards the Sussex coast, and the wind blowing gently, it was wafted slowly along, until, ultimately, it was lost to view. The intent of Mr. Green was to test the powers of his balloon by attempting to cross the British Channel, and land, as occasion might serve, on some part of the continent; and from the favourable state of the weather, and his well known aeronautic skill, and the confidence expressed by him previous to his entering the car, there is every reason to believe he would be enabled to accomplish his design.

A Perfect Sydney Smith in Petticoats.

Queen Elizabeth's indignation at the marriage of her bishops carried her almost beyond the bounds of delicacy, and when Archbishop Parker remonstrated with her on what he called the “Popish tendency” of a prohibition, which was peculiarly offensive to him as a married man, she told him, “she opened of having made any married bishops,” and even spoke with contempt of the institution of matrimony altogether. It is well known that the first time the Queen honored the archiepiscopal palace with a visit—on which occasion an enormous expense, and immense trouble and fatigue, had been incurred by the prime and his wife; instead of the gracious word of acknowledgment, which the latter naturally expected to receive at parting from the royal guest, her Majesty replied her dutiful attention with the following insult: “And you,” said she, “madam I may not call you, mistress I am ashamed to call you; but, howsoever, I thank you.” Elizabeth looked as sour on bishops' daughters as she did on their wives; and having heard that Pilkington, Bishop of Durham, had given his daughter in marriage a fortune of £10,000, equal to the portion bequeathed by her father, Henry VIII. to her and her sister, she scolded the son of Durham of a thousand a year, and devoted the money to her garrison at Berwick.—Agnes Strickland's Queens of England.

Horrible Case: Sentence of Death.

At the Stafford assizes, on Wednesday last, before Justice Maule, Charles Higginson, aged 26, was tried for the wilful murder of his son on the 2d April last. It appeared that the prisoner, who is described by the reporter as a man of dull and stolid look, was a widower. He had but one child, a little boy, aged five years. This little fellow he put out to board, but was unable to pay the charge, one shilling and sixpence a week, for his maintenance. He was told that he must remove him, which he did, borrowing a spade from the parties by whom alone the poor boy had been supported. The prisoner reappeared without the child, and gave such answers to repeated inquiries made respecting him that suspicion was excited. At length, he said his son had died as he was taking him through the wood, and he had buried him there. Search was made, and, near a gate, some fresh soil was observed, upon turning up which the body of the poor boy was found about ten inches below the surface. There was a handkerchief over the eyes, and another very tightly bound over the mouth. There were contusions on the head, but no fractures. From the state of the lungs, the surgeon thought he had died of suffocation. The surgeon having given his evidence, the prisoner, was asked if he had any questions to put to him. He replied, “I put the child in alive.” A thrill of horror run through the court at this declaration. The Jury found the prisoner guilty, and the Judge immediately passed sentence of death upon him, holding out no hope of mercy.

Progress of Enterprise in the West. A very interesting meeting took place at Alleghany on Saturday last, for the purpose of adopting measures for the construction of a steamboat wharf. A commodious harbor entirely secure from the ice, capable of containing one hundred steamboats, and having a communication with the canal and the Ohio, can it seems be constructed for $40,000. From the spirit exhibited at the meeting and the energetic manner in which the project has been taken up, we have no doubt that it will be brought to a successful completion.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, SEPT. 27, 1843.

We find that the “Quincy Whig” has some very righteous remarks to make concerning the Mormons, emanating from the purest principles of patriotism(?) The editor has had some “private conversation” with some individual, or individuals about certain charges brought against the Mormons, particularly that of screening horse thieves.

We think that the Whig has not done itself much credit in advocating the principles contained in those resolutions—we leave that however for a discerning public to judge.

Concerning the horse thieves however, the informant of the “Whig” would have shown himself a better friend to society to have given information to the proper authorities and had these parts of society brought to condign punishment. And the editor of that paper would have proven himself more patriotic by telling us who these people are that are softened in our midst—than dealing thus in generalities, and stabbing in the dark. Come, Mr. Whig, out with it, and let us know who it is that is found transgressing; who knows but that far fallen as we are there yet may be virtue enough left to prosecute a horse thief. We have tried this move thus once and prosecuted them as far as Carthage; but no sooner do they arrive in the jail there than we lose all track of them. The lock of the door is so slippery that it lets them all out. We presume however that it is on account of the honesty of the people(?) We are pleased to find that the Whig is in the secret.

Mr. Livings, of this city, had a horse stolen last week, and we frequently have occurrences of the kind. Will the editor of that paper be so kind as to ask his informant who the thieves are, and where they live, and give us the desired information and we shall esteem it a peculiar favor.

More Mormon difficulties.—The Mormons are the most unfortunate people in the world; they don't know how to do anything right, any more than the man in the fable who together with his son, tried to please every body. If the Mormons vote for the whigs, they do wrong; if for the democrats, their conduct is equally criminal. We are reminded of the old adage, you'll be d—d if you do, and you'll be d—d if you don't. We were blamed for voting for reelection for the democrats, a while ago, and now for the whigs. We are persuaded however, that if one revelation teaches part of us to vote for the whigs; and the other for the democrats, that our revelations will teach about as much in politics as other people's do them, that is, we do as we please. Judge Douglas and his friends however, need not complain, as he is elected.

From the State Register.

JUDGE DOUGLASS AND THE DEMOCRATS OF THE FIFTH DISTRICT.

MEANS EDITORS.—Gentlemen:—Permit me through the columns of your paper, in behalf of Judge Douglass and the democracy of the fifth district, to correct one or two erroneous conclusions, which your readers have come to, from statements made at different times in the Register, in relation to the late canvass for Congress in this district. We do not impugn the motives of the editors of the Register, in making the statements from which these conclusions are drawn. We have no reason to doubt but that they are unintentional errors, made under a misapprehension of facts. To correct one or two of the most prominent of these errors, which have found a place in the minds of our democratic friends, in as brief a manner as possible, shall be the object of this communication.

It is reasonably inferred from the general tenor of the remarks of the Register, that Judge Douglass received the vote of our Mormon citizens, in this district, for congress; which impression if true would leave it conclusive, that Judge D. was a very weak man in his district, if with the aid of 750 Mormon votes, he could be elected by only about 500 majority. But such is not the case: it is well known to every prominent man in the district, that Mr. Brownning received nearly the unanimous vote of the Mormons, and that these votes were given against Judge Douglass, and for Mr. Brownning, under express written instructions from the city of Nauvoo. Democrats, who belong to the Mormon church, stated in numerous instances on the day of election, that they were voting against Judge Douglass, because they had received letters from the head of the church at Nauvoo, requesting them to do so. It was also stated, in Warsaw, immediately subsequent to the election, by one of the most respected gentlemen of that church, Elder Orson Hyde, that he had spent three weeks previous to the election, in this district doing what he could for Browning among the members of the Mormon church.

This much in relation to Judge Douglass having received the vote of the Mormon citizens generally, or even of the Mormon democrats, in the district. We make no complaint of that portion of our friends among the members of the Mormon church, who voted against us; their privileges as free men, are too sacred, for us to strive to control or direct them in the exercise of their elective franchise; we believe that they, and their friends in Nauvoo have acted under misapprehensions, and false statements, in relation to the true state of the case; we believe that there has been gross deception, base falsehoods, and black hearted villainy practiced upon the prominent members of that church at Nauvoo, in order to procure their influence against Judge Douglass, which is without a parallel; of the instruments of these foul stratagems of damning perfidy we have no remarks to make at the present time: we leave them to write under the scorpion lash of popular indignation, when the retribution of equal and exact justice shall be meted out to them.

Another inference which the tenor of the remarks in the Register would leave upon the minds of the readers is: that Judge Douglass has run behind the usual strength of his party in this district. This if true is not very complimentary to the democracy of the district, or to their candidate for congress, who was nominated against his expressed or published wishes, and who was required by them to sacrifice his personal convenience and interest, by resigning the distinguished office of Judge of the Supreme Court, which he held at the time he received the nomination for congress.

But so far are these conclusions from being correct, that these facts are decidedly the reverse. Judge Douglass did receive a large vote for congress over and above the strength of his party in the fifth district. And we will demonstrate that such is the case. In the canvass of 1842 (Gov. Ford, then candidate for Governor) received nearly the entire Mormon vote of the counties now composing the fifth district, and in those counties he received about 750 majority over Governor Duncanson. It was asserted by Elder Orson Hyde immediately preceding the late election, that there was at least 750 Mormon voters in the district. Now if the 750 Mormon voters that voted for Mr. Brown, had voted for Judge Douglass it would have made Douglass a majority 1500 greater than it now is—add to the 1500 the 445 which he received over Mr. Browning, and it makes the vote in his favor 1945, which is eleven hundred and ninety five votes over and above the democratic majority in the district in 1842, which consequently leaves Judge D. that number of votes ahead of the strength of his party in the district.

Space will not permit us to go into further detail at the present time. We have treasured thus far upon the readers of the Register, in order to procure for Judge Douglass, and for the democracy of the fifth district the just credit that is due to them for their hard fought battle in the cause of the great principles of democracy, and for their signal victory, while encountering most singular and unprecedented difficulties at every stage of the contest, and which required as it received from nearly every democrat in the district, unyielding energy, and unmitigated exertions, and the eternal vigilance which is the price of democratic victory, in order to counteract, prove false, and render nugatory, the most uncharitably effort to procure our defeat.

Thus much we have deemed due to Judge Douglass, to his numerous friends, and to the Democracy of the fifth district.

More Whig falsehoods.—The following paragraph is going the rounds of the whig papers of this state and Missouri.—We think it probable that the notorious Edwards at Burlington, who wrote it, knew it to be false at the time; but certainly those who copied it knew it to be so. They knew that Gov. Ford did not refuse to issue a writ in compliance with the requisition of the Governor of Missouri—because some of these very whig editors denounced Governor Ford for issuing the writ, and shed crocodile tears over the poor Mormons, whom Ford's writ was intended to murder, as they then declared. It suits them now to lie about it—take it all back, and insist upon it, that Ford never issued a writ at all: What a set of rascals!

The story that 20,000 Missourians are about to invade the state is also a fabrication. There is nothing of the kind in agitation. The officers elected, we learn, have been commissioned, and have entered peaceably on the discharge of their duties.

More Mormon difficulties.—The Burlington (I. T.) Hawk Eye says that a convention was to be held at Carthage, Illinois, on Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of this week, to take into consideration the propriety of adopting defensive measures in relation to the Mormons. The same paper remarks:

The late refusal on the part of Gov. Ford to issue a writ in compliance with the requisition of the Governor of Missouri for Joseph Smith, has awakened a spirit which we fear may end in bloodshed. The Missourians, 20,000 in number it is said, stand ready to co-operate with the Illinoisans. It is expected there will be a great crowd at Carthage on the occasion.

or hereafter, to go into the merits of that document, for I hold the maxim good that the "Union is interested in the Union" but at the present time I have another subject on the table, which more immediately concerns the wise and honest portions of the American people. I reason from facts, no matter who may cry "hush!" as to Mormonism, and the "disgrace" which the State of Missouri inherits from her barbarous treatment, and unlawful extermination of the Mormon people. The great day has already been ushered in, and the voice of a Mormon is not only heard, setting forth his own rights, and preaching the gospel of the Son of God, in power and demonstration, incontrovertible from revelation, in every city and hamlet in our wide-spread American free states, but other realms and kingdoms hear the same things; even the Indians, Australia, Pacific Islands, Great Britain, Ireland, Scotland, Germany and the Holy Land, where God himself once spoke, have heard a "Mormon," and all this in the short space of twelve or fourteen years; yes, and measures have been taken, that Russia may hear the "watchman cry."

Now sir, what has been done, can be done. I shall not be surprised if the Mormons undertake to cope with the world. Virtue and truth, are twin sisters, of such winning charms, that honest men of every nation, kindred and tongue, will fall in love with them; and what hinders the Mormons, with the Bible in one hand and honesty in the other, from Mormonizing all honest men? Nothing. The meaning of Mormon, the prophet Joe says, is "More Good," no matter where it is; the Mormons will have it, and if they cannot obtain it by exertion in the world, they will merit it by faith and prayer from the "old promise" of "ask and ye shall receive." But do not think that I, even I, have been Mormonized, by what I write, for I say Nay, though I am willing to admit, and all men of sense will do the same; the more light, the more truth; the more truth, the more love; the more love, the more virtue; the more virtue, the more peace; the more peace, the more heaven; what every body wants. The Mormons believe rather too much for me, I can't come it.

Another word on Missouri. When her Constitution was framed; they commenced the preamble as follows: "We the people of Missouri &c., by our representatives in convention assembled, at St. Louis, on Saturday the 12th day of June, 1820 do mutually agree to establish a FREE AND INDEPENDENT REPUBLIC, &c." Independent Republic well some of their subsequent acts prove the truth of it, and as the broad folds of the constitution often conceal more than meets the eye, notwithstanding it is the "Axis of the people," to keep law-makers and law-breakers within and without bounds—let me quote from the 13th article of the aforesaid constitution, the 3d paragraph: "That the people have a right peaceably to assemble for their common good, and to apply to those vested with the powers of government, for redress of grievances; and that their right to bear arms in defence of themselves and the State, CANNOT BE QUESTIONED." This over-wise right of gun-fence was made, as I have learned, for breachy Indians, but was used by Gov. Boggs, as a sine qua non, pointed with steel and burning with brimstone, to exterminate the Mormons. Truly, we may ask, what is right, and what is law, contrary to the constitution? The Legislature of Missouri acknowledged the exterminating order of Boggs as constitutional, and appropriated more than $200,000 to pay the drivers and robbers, and I may as well say, mobbers of the Mormons, for services rendered the state in 1838. O Glorious O Crumand! VIATOR.

SHOEMAKERS' PLAN.

Mr. Editor:—Sir, In accordance with our promise of last week, we now present to you and the public the plan spoken of by the journeymen Shoemakers. We are well aware, Sir, that we ought not to seek our own benefit alone in this particular, and that our intentions and plans ought to be liberal. Such they are, and we have no doubt but that they will meet with your approbation, together with that of the citizens at large. The plan is not a new one. It has been fully and prosperously carried out by the Cabinet Makers of Philadelphia; (in the main) advantageously to themselves, and to the community at large. The last I heard of them was that their numbers had diminished, and that they kept the best store in that city, and employed quite a number of hands. The plan is simply this:

It shall be the duty of the Company to rent a Store in a conspicuous and business part of the city, and they shall appoint a responsible individual to attend said store, and a proper per centage shall be allowed him for the sales he makes, and should he find the business too much for him, he can employ an assistant, as the more he sells, the more per centage he receives. The Company, individually, find their own materials at the cheapest rate possible, and make their own shoes and turn them into said Store. The agent books down the article received, such as a kind, such a quality, and such a price; thus goods will be retailed out at half cash and the remainder in country produce, or such articles as will be necessary for the workmen, at the lowest cash price, as there will not be any thing allowed on such articles as shall be received in exchange for boots and shoes, consequently the workmen will not have to pay an advanced price on such goods as he shall require of the farmer, for the use of his family, but will receive them at the lowest rate. Again: we could receive in payment Hides, &c., and providing that our tanners will give the same price for said hides as elsewhere. They would certainly receive the preference; or, if they would (as they will) as well as cheap as elsewhere, it would be a duty devolving on us to retain them, and have them tanned in this city; but they must come under the principle of competition as well as we, or else ask no favors. You will also observe, Sir, that any one man can carry the above plan into execution, provided he has a sufficient capital to pay the men as fast as they turn in their shoes; but he must expect to reap a profit on the farmers' produce. If he does, he kills the trade, and the principle of competition with the East would be rendered impossible. We do not think it necessary or essential to give you all the by-laws and regulations that may be found necessary to carry out the plan effectually as a company; but we have given you the fundamental points. There is one advantage in said plan, that is, should any one become dissatisfied, he can withdraw without any injury to himself or the company; and should any one desire to become a member, all he has to do is to give in his name and pay his fraction of the rent of said store.

We have now given you the plan, and you must say that it is liberal enough to take in all the world, if they were Shoemakers. The citizens can now judge of the merits or demerits of said plan; and we would like to hear it fairly canvassed thoroughly in your paper, and its defects, if any there be, brought to light, and a better one adopted.

By order of the Committee.

Pruning Fruit Trees.—It will be found upon an experiment, that a wound made on a tree in March or April, will look black as soon as the sap begins to flow, and that the sap will ooze out until the leaves have put out so as to receive it; while a wound made in June, will remain white, and immediately commence healing. A tree that has been broken by being loaded with fruit, or otherwise, while the tree is green with foliage, the wound will look white, and the wood remain sound; while one broken in the winter by snow, or from other cause, will look black, and incline to decay.

It has been my humble lot to spend the most of my time in the spring and fore part of the summer, in engraving and pruning fruit trees; and my experience goes to prove that the best time for pruning is when the leaves are full grown, and the tree is in a vigorous and growing state. For, at this season, when the sap has been spent in the foliage, and the pores of the wood are filled, so that when the limb is taken off, the sun and warm weather will dry the end of the limb and close the pores of the wood against the weather, and the sap will keep the limb alive to the very end, and the healing will be perceived immediately.

[Boston Cultivator.]

Will of James Wood, Esq.—After several years' litigation, the will and codicils of James Wood, Esq., the late wealthy banker and draper of Gloucester, have been proved in Doctors' Commons. He gives to the corporation of Gloucester £60,000; to Mr. Phillips £50,000; to Mrs. Goodlake £20,000; to Mr. Smith £20,000; to Mr. Cleveland £14,000; and to the family of the latter gentleman £6,000; and the residue of his property, estimated at about £500,000, to his executors. The property has been sworn under £900,000, and the probate bears a stamp of £12,000. The executors named are Alderman Wood, John Chubbhorn, Esq. (who committed suicide, some time back, under very extraordinary circumstances,) Jacob Osborn, Esq., and John Surman, Esq. The charges of three proctors, engaged in the suit relative to the will, amount to £47,536.3s.2d.

REVIEW OF THE SAINT LOUIS MARKETS.

RECEIVED AT OFFICE.
St. Louis, Sept. 13, 1843.

Remarks.—In the market for produce there has not been any material changes to note since our last week's report. Prices continuing firm and receipts as full as can be expected at this season of the year. The weather this week has been cloudy, cold and disagreeable, and considerably rain has fallen, which will probably cause a rise in the rivers, which are very low. The Panama, which arrived this morning from the Illinois river reports a rise of four inches at Peru, and two feet water in the channel. In the channel of the Missouri, there is about four feet water, and on the lower Rapid of the Mississippi, from twenty-eight to thirty inches; below this city, at Cairo, there is from five to five and a half feet water in the shallow places.

Flour.—A few sales of Country Mills have been effected this week at $3 75; not however to any large amount. Holders are firm, and there are no heavy purchasers at these figures. We have heard of no sales from City Mills beyond retail, but considerable lots have been sent forward, and a large part of the receipts is also re-shipped.

Wheat.—The demand and price remains unchanged. Prime lots command readily 70 and 80 cents. Inferior ranges from 50 to 62 1/2. The receipts are not so liberally free, but not more than sufficient to keep the mill in operation.

Corn.—The demand is good, both for city use and for shipment. At the mills White corn commands 23 and 25 cents, without sack. On the levee we have heard of no sales; but a good article in good shipping order will bring 28 cents, sack included. The most of that received this week, has been re-shipped.

Oats.—There is very little coming in at present. On the Levee we have noticed no sales. From wagons it brings from 16 to 18 cents per bushel, and is in good demand.

Hemp.—There has been no change in the price since our last, $2 75 and 3 00 being the range within which all the sales of last week of fair and choice lots, have been made. There has not been much doing however, the receipts being very light, and the market but scantily supplied.

Lard.—Strictly prime in kegs is very scarce; common also medium is more abundant, and dull. Prime we quote at 5 and 5 1/2 cents in kegs; common, 3 and 3 1/2, and in good demand; medium 4 and 4 1/2 cents. The receipts for all qualities is light. A common article is in most request, for manufacturing purposes.

Bacon.—There is but little demand beyond what is required for city use. We heard of sales this week of choice Hams at 5 1/2—clear Sides in bulk at 2 1/2 cents. Ordinary country cured Hams we quote at 3 1/2 and 4 1/2 cents, and Shoulders at 2 and 2 1/2 cents. Hams for family use, will command 5 and 6 cents. There is a fair stock in market, and the receipts have been very liberal this week; a large part of which, however, has been for re-shipment.

Pork.—Our quotations are nominal—any for Pims $8 and 6 1/2—Mesa, $8 and 5 1/2. There is no enquiry made, and very little in the market.

FALL & WINTER READY MADE CLOTHING

At wholesale and retail.
M. BROWN, at 52 Main street, St. Louis, has already received several shipments, and will continue to receive weekly fresh supplies of superior ready made clothing, the goods of which were bought at auction, for cash, previous to the late advance on goods, and made up under his immediate direction by a whole-sale clothing house in the city of New York, with which he is connected. His stock will be large, comprising every article kept in a clothing or furnishing store.

Having one of the best cutters in the United States to superintend that department, he is confident his garments will compare successfully with any in this city, in finish, beauty, make or fit.

Persons visiting St. Louis for the purpose of replenishing their wardrobes, either in clothing or furnishing articles, will do well to call on the subscriber, where they will not only find the most fashionable and best made garments, but at prices decidedly lower than any other house in the city of St. Louis.

M. BROWN, 52 Main st.,

A Harpist Pined.—At the late Term of the Circuit Court, a witness of the lower classes was cross examined by Mr. Bennett, Queen's Counsel, when the following dialogue took place:—Counsel.—Why do you hesitate to answer me? You look at me as if I was a rogue? Witness.—To be sure I do. (Laughter.) Counsel.—Upon your oath you think I am a rogue? Witness.—You may say I don't think you an honest man. (Continued laughter.) Counsel.—You swear that on your oath? Witness.—I do, to be sure; and what else could I think? Counsel.—Now, why do you think so? Witness.—Why, because you're doing your best to make me perjure myself.

American Conversation.—It was rather barren of interest, to say the truth, and the greater part of it may be summed up in one word—dollars. All their cares, hopes, joys, afflictions, virtues, and associations seem to be melted down into dollars. Whatever the chance contributions that fell into the "slow" children of their talk, they make the great thick slab with dollars. Men were weighed by their dollars, measures gauged by their dollars; life was reckoned by their dollars, and knickered down for its dollars. The next respectable thing to dollars was any venture having their attainment for its end. The more of that worthless ballast, honour and false dealing, which any man cast overboard from the ship of his good name and good intent, the more humble glancing room he had for his dollars. Make commerce the hugger and mighty theft. Deface the banner of the nation for an idle rag; pollute it star by star; and cut out stripes by stripes as from the arm of a degraded soldier. Do anything for dollars! What is a flag to them?—Martin Chuzzlewit.

John Fisher, believed to be the last surviving soldier in Scotland engaged in the first American war, died at Leslie on Friday last the 28th ult., at the age of 92 years. In the year 1776 he enlisted into the 1st Royal Regiment of foot, of which Lord Adam Gordon was colonel, but which was at that time commanded by Lieutenant Colonel Thomas Fraser. Fisher served in this regiment in the American war, and went from thence to the West Indies, and was at the taking of the island of St. Eustatia, for which he expected considerable prize-money, but did not get more than a few shillings. He was discharged at his own request in 1783, after seven years service, and returned to his native land, where he earned his living as a labourer. He was a sober steady man, and retained his faculties to the last; and was but a short time missed off the streets of Leslie, on which he was in the habit of taking a daily walk.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.
The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPFIRE LOZENGES.
For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally, Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.
The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.
This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast, or any other part of the body; ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents) brings it within the reach of every person in the community. A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

SPRAYED FROM THE TEMPLE.
ABOUT two months ago a dark brown Cow, white face, carries her head high, lop horned, bright eyes, a white spot on one hind foot, white on the end of the tail, white bag, rather short teats, nine years old last spring, she was expected to calve in a few days when she went away, she is not a very large Cow but pretty stout built.

ALSO, a black Cow, white face, white feet, lower part of tail white, had a dirty red and white band on her horns across her forehead, she was very poor when she went away, gave a little milk; had no calf, rather a small sized Cow, and about seven years old as near as can be remembered.

Whoever will give information of either or both of the Cows to the Temple Committee or the Temple Recorder, or will bring them to the Temple will do us a favor, and if they desire it a reasonable compensation shall be allowed for trouble and expense.

The descriptions are as near as can be remembered, but only having them here a little while it may possibly not be exactly correct. WM. CLAYTON,
Temple Recorder.

I would say to emigrants, and all the brethren, that I have a few lots on hand that I will sell very cheap, as I am going on my mission soon, and wish to sell before I go.

Also, I have lots with buildings on them. If any one wishes for a good store building near the Temple, I can accommodate them. BRIGHAM YOUNG.

four such as we generally see. Instead of keeping hogs for a year, half a year, or a year, it would be a great saving to give them the same food in one year. Hogs should never be kept more than one winter. Every farmer knows that some hogs are more thrifty than others, and he should improve his breed by selecting such. —Am. Farmer.

Labor.—It should never be lost sight of to inculcate this truth equally on the rich, that they may not forget themselves, and on the poor, that they may not forget what is due to them by society; that, as all wealth owes its source, its supply, and its continuance of value to human labor, without that labor there would be neither subsistence, nor comfort, nor society itself. Men would be no better than savages in a soil uncultivated; and arts and sciences themselves must be extinct, if the hand of labor did not support them, by providing those riches which produce the activity of commerce, and the circulation of wealth and prosperity in all nations. The far greater part of the population of this and every other country belong to, or have risen from, the laboring classes, and by them the happiness and comforts of those who are independent of personal labor, not excluding the very highest, are essentially influenced. This requires to be more particularly enforced, because it goes to resist a very pernicious practice in all families, rich and poor, that of depreciating the industrious and laboring people, as an inferior class of beings; which is especially the case in families which keep servants, who are too generally permitted to form the character of children. This evil has deeper effects and more mischievous consequences than may be supposed by those who are not accustomed to trace effects back to their causes with due attention in the progress of the mind from infancy to youth. It is indeed impossible that children in any situation, can be correctly trained, unless those who surround them from infancy are previously well instructed; mothers who nurse their own children, and watch their mind's growth, are always rewarded in the health and habit of them.

The new producing powers obtained from mechanical improvements and chemical discoveries, are so misdirected, as to be made the most powerful engines yet known, to inflict poverty and distress on the largest portion of mankind, I mean that portion of it, which, by their labor, produces all the wealth which is consumed by those who create none for themselves. This new scientific, mechanical, and chemical power, is advancing, with the efficient force of an army equal to many hundred millions of men, well disciplined, equipped, and provided, to accomplish its purpose. I believe I am much within the real amount, when I state, that the increase of this new power within the last ten years, over European and America, has exceeded in its results, each year, upon the average of that period, the well directed industry of twenty millions of laborers unaided by machinery or other scientific aid. This is the power which will force the nations who are now the most advanced in arts and sciences to stand still, and enquire what is to be done with this enormous force, daily increasing, in direct competition with all the producing classes, having a continual tendency to diminish, under the existing system of trade and commerce, the value of their labor, and to reduce them and their families to poverty and slavery. Modern governments know not what measures to adopt, to give this enormous and continually increasing power a right direction. Yes! as governments and nations, they will be speedily overwhelmed by that worthless object, for which they have been all taught to sacrifice their real happiness, and which they now worship as their god: I mean WEALTH—what is called gold and silver and bank notes, which, after all, but represent real wealth." [Robert Owen.]

Debt.—There is nothing more to be dreaded than debt. When a person, whose principles are good, unhappily falls into this situation, added to a peace and comfort. The reflection embitters every meal, and drives from the eyelids refreshing sleep. It corrodes and cankers every cheerful idea, and like a stern Cerberus, guards each avenue to the heart, so that pleasure dares not approach. Happy! thrice happy! are those who are blessed with an independent competence, and can confine their wants within the bounds of that competence, be it what it may. To such alone the bread of life is palatable and nourishing. Sweet is the morsel that is acquired by honest industry, the produce of which is permanent, or it flows from a source which will not fail. A subsistence that is precarious or procured by an uncertain prospect of payment, carries neither wine nor oil with it. Let us, therefore, gain a reprieve that the person who is deeply involved in debt, experiences on earth all the tortures the poets describe to be the lot of the wretched inhabitants of Tartarus.

LETTERS FROM MR. WEED.

Correspondent of the Albany Evening Journal, London, July, 21.

I am myself much pleased with Mr. Samuel Johnson. "Are you incredulous?" Then let me explain. We dined at the Dr. Samuel Johnson Tavern, a Steak and Chop House, in Bolt Court, where the great English scholar and moralist lived. In entering the threshold, passed so many hundred times by the Author of Rasselas, emotions of reverence and awe came over me which the presence or personification of genius, virtue or piety only can inspire. Would that these walls could impart to visitors some portion of the ethereal spirit with which their former illustrious occupant was so deeply imbued.

When Dr. Johnson came to London he took up his residence in a Court which still bears his name; but he soon removed to the house I refer to in Bolt Court, where he resided many years, and where so many of his achievements in Letters and Literature were accomplished. These Courts both run off Fleet street, and are in the vicinity of Temple Bar and the Strand. The room in which Dr. Johnson read and wrote, upon the first floor, is a projection from the main building, about twelve feet long and eight wide, with a flat roof, through which he had a skylight constructed. This room remains as he left it, through the other portions of the building have been slightly modernized.

I have been to Westminster Abbey, that magnificent and sublime sepulchre for Monarchs, Princes, Philosophers, Philanthropists, Poets and Painters. All that I had heard and read of the architectural and historical wonders of the Abbey, into whose vaults, chapels, nave and niches, the ashes of the illustrious dead of eight centuries have been gathered, left me wholly unprepared for the grandeur and "gorgeousness" of the memorials here revealed. Here repose all that remains of the mortality of those who were ennobled either by birth or by deeds, with all that marble and brass can do to perpetuate their fame. But tombs and tablets and monuments and statues, however ambitiously adorned or exquisitely wrought, serve far more effectually to illustrate a Creator's power, than to magnify a creature's rank or name.

I lingered about these silent chambers of the mighty dead with inquiring eyes, until the visitor's hours had expired. Westminster Abbey has been so often described that it is a relief to feel that my wholly inadequate powers need not be charged with a task of such difficulty and magnitude. And even were it otherwise, I should not have the presumption to attempt it. To say nothing of the thousands of comparatively ignoble whose undistinguished ashes rest here, there are nearly four hundred tablets, monuments, mausoleums, statues of other obituary memorials of persons whose history and character constitutes the written annals of England.

If some of the inscriptions upon these monuments strike others as they do me I shall not weary your patience transcribing a few of them.

The Duke of Buckingham, who was distinguished during the reign of Charles I. lies in brass effigy, with a Roman costume, upon the altar with this inscription: I lived doubtful, not dissolute—I die unloved, not unresigned. Ignorance and error are incident to human nature. I trust in an Almighty and an all good God. And below, both prepared by himself, is this: "For my King often, for my Country ever."

The following is an extract from the inscription upon the monument erected to the memory of the young Princes who were murdered by the order of Richard the third: Here lie the relics of Edward V. King of England, and his brother Richard, Duke of York, who being confined in the Tower, and there stifled with pillows, were privately and meanly buried, by order of their perfidious uncle, Richard the Usurper. Their bones, long and anxiously inquired after, having lain 150 years in the rubbish of the Tower stairs, were on the 17th July, 1674, by undoubted proofs, discovered.

The monument of the Duke and the Duchess of Newcastle is one of the most costly in the Abbey. They lie, in bronze effigy, under a stately canopy. The inscription, after setting forth the Duke's qualities, states that his Duchess was of a noble family; for all the brothers were noble and all the sisters virtuous. This Duchess was a wise, witty and learned lady, which her many books do well testify, &c.

There is an expensive and exceedingly appropriate monument to the memory of Sir Isaac Newton, with an inscription closing with this exclamation: "How much reason mortals have to pride themselves in the existence of such and so great an ornament to the human race!" The monument to the memory of Major Andre, is a beautifully sculptured group, representing the first interview between Washington and Andre. The figure of Washington has been three different times so badly mutilated that new heads were supplied. There is now a striking and undoubted likeness of the Father of his country in Westminster Hall.

The colossal marble statue of George Canning, and another of James Watt, both Chantry, stands conspicuously in the Abbey, and are noble specimens of the art. Would that the unwieldy, ill designed, and American marble effigy of Washington, that shocks the national feelings of those who visit the Rotunda of the Capitol at Washington, had the form and comeliness of one of these all but speaking statues.

The monument erected by King James

the first to the memory of Queen Elizabeth is the most imposing and costly, as is most interesting in other respects, to visitors of any of the Abbey. A full length likeness of the Queen, in her robes, is admirably cut in brass and placed in a recumbent posture on her tomb. The inscription, among other things, describes her as the Mother of her Country, and the patroness of religion and learning; that she was herself skilled in many languages, adorned with every excellence of mind and person, and endowed with princely virtues beyond her sex; that in her reign peace was established; money restored to its just value; Ireland almost lost by the secret contrivances of Spain; recovered; the Spanish Armada defeated; and, in short, all England enriched; that she was a most prudent governess, and for forty years a virtuous and triumphant Queen." &c. &c.

The Coronation Chairs, two of which stand in the Abbey, are interesting, not less for their antiquity than the use to which they have been so long consecrated. The most ancient of these chairs was brought by King Edward I., with Regalia, from Scotland, in 1297. The other was made for Queen Mary. On Coronation occasions (which take place here) one of these chairs is covered with gold tissue, and placed before the altar. These relics of Ancient Monarchy, while it is evident that the utmost skill and taste of the artisan was bestowed, show that the business of chair making in those days was in its rudest state.

THE SHAME OF ENGLAND.

Hunger and Conjugal Affection.

The condition of ten millions of the population of Great Britain is a disgrace to a nation calling itself civilized. Three out of ten millions, if British statements can be relied on, live chiefly on oatmeal and potatoes. Brougham, in one of his speeches, affirmed that there were instances where seven of ten persons had remained whole days without a morsel of food—laying on their beds of straw two days in succession, under the impression that a recumbent position lightened the pangs of hunger. At coroner's inquests in one district he has recently administered in sixty-three cases, where death was caused by starvation! Dr. Taylor, an intelligent observer, lately published a "Tour through the Manufacturing Districts." At Colne, he visited eighty-three dwellings. The furniture was boxes and stones for tables and chairs, straw and shavings for beds. The meals were oatmeal and water for breakfast, oatmeal with a little skimmed milk for dinner, oatmeal and water for supper. But one answer to an enquiry was an affecting one. At Bolton, he entered the dwelling of a young couple, six years married. On a clean table of coarse wood was the only meal they had tasted for twenty-four hours—the only one they had in view for twenty-four hours to come. It was meal porridge, an oatmeal cake, tea diluted until it was nearly colorless, and a little coarse sugar in a broken bowl. Their furniture had been sold piece-meal, and their clothes pawned for food. The husband might have emigrated, but he would not leave his wife to die. On enquiring whether he did not regret his early marriage he paused, looked fondly at his wife, who returned his gaze with a melancholy smile of enduring affection—he dashed the tear aside, and with calm firmness replied: "Never! We have been happy, and have suffered together; she has been the same to me all through." Such is a specimen of nature's nobility that are crushed by the hoary oligarchy that rule Great Britain; thousands of them, to sustain life, work, so says Brougham, for less than a penny a day! —[Post]

Power of Imagination.—The celebrated Dr. Cullen, of Edinburgh, had, in one of his lectures stated that imagination was sometimes the cause of diseases. A few of the students, being desirous of bringing the remarks of their learned preceptor to the test of experience, left the city one summer morning, expecting to fall in with a simple waggoner with whom they were acquainted, and who, they knew, would come to Edinburgh with a load of coals that day. They arranged themselves so as to be at the distance of about a quarter of a mile from each other. The first, on meeting the man, accosted him thus:

Joek, what is the matter with you? You seem very unwell. Unwell, said Joek, de'il hie is the matter wi' me. I only wish I was in Edinburgh to get my parritch. In a few minutes he was met by a second one, who, with a very serious countenance said:—Dear me, Joek, what makes you go abroad in such a situation? You look as pale as death. I feel an un-pleasant pain in my head, said Joek; and I begin to feel awfully tired as I am going along the road. He was next asked a similar question. The poor fellow now began to believe he was indisposed. He felt sick at his stomach, and to use his own words, like bane in his body was no sair, that he could scarcely gang on farther. In truth he didn't ken how to haud up his head. He made shifts, however, to crawl along until he fell in with the fourth, who told him he looked like the picture of death. You need na tell me that, said Joek, I fin' that I am na lang for this world. Oh my head! Oh my back! I canna stae. Oh, do my gude master let me lean on your arm, and take me into the house, or I shall die by the side o' the dyke!

Joek was accordingly put to bed, received medical aid from those on whose skill he reposed the fullest confidence, and was well on the ensuing day. It is no more than fair to state that the students were so well pleased with their experiment, that they were perfectly willing to pay for it, and accordingly they presented Joek with fifty guineas, for the amusement they had caused him.

Preserving Bees.—These industrious insects have been successfully preserved from the miller by having tubes projecting some ten or fifteen inches from the hives, instead of holes cut in the sides for their passage way into the hives. The miller will not fight on the end of the tube, and is unable to find an entrance.

A correspondent of the Genesee Farmer buries his bees under the ground in winter, digs a trench in light elevated ground, the bottom having a gentle slope to guard against standing water, places the hives on small stumps, and then covers them with straw and earth. Of thirty or forty hives thus buried, he lost none. They consumed less honey than when kept in the usual way.

Newspapers with Letter Postage.—The Postmaster General directs that newspapers in which, after the regular edition has been printed, the matter is removed, and the handbills inserted, shall pay letter postage. If these handbills be in the regular edition of the paper it would only be taxed with newspaper postage.

A Father Murdered by his Son.—John Barnatt, of Mayville, N.Y., was lately killed by his son James, a youth of 21, in a quarrel between them. He struck his father on the head, with an axe, mangled him horribly. He was drawn at the inquest, he was committed to trial.

A Wise One.—A Millerite at Dover, N. H., when advocating the good effects of Millerism said: I believe that the Miller doctrine comes from God; whether it prove true or false!

A Second Revolution in Haiti is now progressing. The rebels are now principally composed of blacks, who desire to overthrow the mulatto government, recently organized. Several skirmishes have occurred between the two forces, in one fight, the blacks had one hundred and five killed. A few Cayes is under martial law, and there appears every reason to apprehend a protracted struggle between the two classes of people. The blacks are headed by King Solomon the first, and his two sons. —[N. Y. Sun.]

Death of a Veteran.—Hill's New Hampshire Patriot announces the death of Jonathan Gamage, of Fryeburg, Me., aged 90. He fought at the battle of Bunker's Hill, and was present at the late Bunker's Hill celebration, and lost his reason from excitement produced by the occasion in which state he died, without any other apparent disease.

A Needle Manufactory.—At Haverstraw, New York, there is a needle manufactory. It is the first of the kind started in America. It is said it necessary, 30,000 can be turned out a day.

Party.—We are not in favor of a blind adoration of party, right or wrong, but we believe it to be the duty of every man to use his influence in favor of that party he believes to be nearest right. We are not in favor of an exclusive, intolerant spirit in politics more than religion, which will not admit of an honest difference of opinion upon matters of minor importance, yet we would not sacrifice principles to expedient, as well in politics as in other things. We do not like to see a man walk with a stiff gait, yet we admire to see him walk erect and keep straight forward. So of a party, political, religious or secular. —[Cheshire Republican.]

It is not infrequent that a wife mourns over the alienated affections of her husband, when she has made no efforts herself to strengthen or increase his attachment. She thinks, because he once loved her, he ought always to love her, and she neglects those attentions which gained his heart. Many a wife is thus the cause of her neglect and sorrow. The woman deserves not a husband's love, who will not greet him with smiles when he returns from the labors of the day, who will not chain him to his home by the sweet enchantment of a cheerful heart. There is not one man in a thousand so unfeeling as to withstand such influence and break away from such a heart.

Nero and Byron.—Nero wished that the whole Roman Empire had but one neck, that he might sever it at a single stroke; and Lord Byron wished that all the ladies in the world had

That he might kiss them all, from North to South.

We think Byron's wish the most charitable, and decidedly the more gallant than the former.

"What an extraordinary tall man that is!" exclaimed a lady to her fair companion, as they passed along Broadway the other day. He's a lawyer now, continued she, although originally designed for the church.

"Rather for the steeple, you should have said," was the complacent response of the gentle companion.

A married man falling into misfortune is more apt to relieve his situation in the world than a single one; chiefly because his spirits are soothed and relieved by domestic endearments, and his self-respect kept alive by finding that, although all abroad by darkness and humiliation, yet there is still a little world of love of which he is monarch.

He that sets out on the journey of life with a profound knowledge of books, but a shallow knowledge of men, with much sense of others and but little of himself, will find himself as completely at a loss on occasions of common and constant recurrence, as a Frenchman without his snuff box, or a Dutchman without his pipe.

A clergyman recently, after exhausting all his zeal and eloquence on his auditory, and finding them still obdurate, concluded his prayer as follows: "And, O Lord, make the hearts of these sinners as soft as their heads!"

Paired, not Mated.—A handsome young girl, named Jewell, has been married to a negro in Massachusetts.

Her beauty hangs upon the shade of night. Like a rich Jewel in an Ethiopian's ear.

They who speak truth, however discovered, have a right to be heard; they who assist others in discovering it, have the yet higher claim to be applauded.

The London Punch, in mentioning that Sir Robert Peel "took the sense" of the House, says it is the smallest homoeopathic dose on record.

Envy. If surrounded on all sides by the brightness of another's prosperity, like the scorpion confined within a circle of fire, will sting itself to death.

When we are alone, we have our thoughts to watch; in our families, our temper; and in society, our tongue.

The latest definition of a "kind husband," is one, who sits and smokes after breakfast, while his wife, with a pail on one arm, and a pail of water on the other, pursues her washing.

A lady between sixty and seventy years of age, was examined the other day at a court in New York, and, on being asked how old she was, replied, that she was over twenty.

If there is a man who may call his bread at peace with God and man, it is that man who has brought that bread out of the earth by his own honest industry. It is cankered by no fraud—it is weak by no tear—it is stained by no blood.

Romance in Humble Life.—A few evenings since, while a party of sailors, who only a few hours before had received their wages from a vessel in which they had returned to England after a long absence, were carousing at a beer shop in the vicinity of Backwall, their joviality was suddenly interrupted by the intrusion of an elderly woman with a few boxes of lucifers, which she offered for sale. The offer was declined, but the benevolent tars made the poor woman sit down and partake of their beer, one of them at the same time remarking that she must find herself upon short allowance, if she had nothing else to depend on for a subsistence but the sale of matches. "Ah!" replied the poor woman, "when my son left me to go to sea, I was doing well enough. He has been gone now three years, and I have never heard from him since he left." Upon hearing this, one of the party inquired the woman's name; "Budd," replied she, "and my son's name is Sam—did you know him, Sir?" Without giving any answer, up started the tar and rushed out of the room, exclaiming, with an oath of astonishment at the discovery he had made, "Sam Budd! Sam Budd! Sam Budd's your mother come to look for you!" and almost at the same moment the lost son, who had only left his messmates a few minutes previously, rushed into the room, and found himself fast locked in the embrace of his delighted parent. The first thing the noble-hearted fellow did was, as he himself termed it, "to shell out all the shot in his locker," which, with evident delight, he poured into his mother's lap; and after sitting some time in conversation together, Jack and his delighted parent went home mutually to relate the vicissitudes of each during their separation.

Repeal Association.—The usual weekly meeting of this body was held at Dublin on Tuesday last. The hanging in of money, and the admission of members, associates, and volunteers, chiefly occupied the time of the Association. The rent for the week was announced to be £2,004, 10s. 8d., after which, an adjournment took place till Friday.

Repeal Demonstration at Castlebar.—This demonstration took place on Sunday. According to the Freeman's Journal, the procession which preceded Mr. O'Connell into Castlebar was fully three miles in length, and the denseness of the crowd was such that it was impossible to move at a more rapid pace than one mile an hour. When the procession had arrived at the place of meeting, the same authorities stated, that there could not have been less than 250,000 or 300,000 persons present. Mark Blake, Esq., M. P., having been called to the chair, briefly addressed the meeting. A vote of confidence in Mr. O'Connell was carried; after which, the learned gentleman addressed the meeting at great length, and on the several topics on which he generally adverted in the course of his orations. In the evening three hundred persons set down to a banquet given to Mr. O'Connell, Mr. Steele, and Mr. D. O'Connell.

A few days since, one of the individuals connected with Batty's establishment, left Batley's Theatre, London, and drove a magnificent carriage, with fourteen horses in pairs, through the city.

MILLERISM—FANATICISM.

The following is from the correspondence of the New York Journal of Commerce. It speaks a little of what we boast as an enlightened age. "What are likely to be the results of Millerism and its kindred fanaticism? Either to make infidels, or proving to all that there is a reality of which their base counterfeits, to lead men to embrace the true religion and secure their consequent happiness."

A Mr. Aylward, who has large estates in the County of Galway, had upwards of three hundred of his tenantry under ejectment, and last week the sheriff (Mr. Cowen), with a strong body of military and police, went to execute the writs of habere; but when this kind-hearted gentleman saw the misery and destitution that should have been the lot of the poor people, and leveling their houses, he said, let what would be the consequences to himself, he would not, for the present, execute the writs. The officer in command of the military warmly applauded this benevolent conduct, and between them they induced the agent of Aylward, who was present, to come upon terms with the poor people, who are all to be left in possession, at a reduced rent, and the whole party went away, followed by blessings and shouts of rejoicing, instead of maledictions and lamentations. —Correspondent of Liverpool Journal.

Baltimore, Conn., Sept. 7, 1843.

Messrs. Editors:—The Miller Camp Meeting which has lately been held in our vicinity, on the line of the Housatonic Rail Road, at a place called Stegler, came to an end on Tuesday morning of Monday night. Such a scene of confusion, fanaticism, and impiety (as it appeared to me), I have never equalled in this country since Columbus first stepped on our shores, unless in the case of the Prophet, at whose career was short, and endeavored to prove that the world would come to an end in 1843. He spoke of the judgment, and eternity with a great deal of solemnity. During his preaching, a man pretended to be inspired, passed up and down the camp with a great tent in his hand, waving it over his head, and crying "Hallelujah and Glory," at the top of his voice. He soon began pointing his finger at certain individuals, making at the same time a muttering sound, with his mouth closed, which the Millerites said meant, that the individual to whom he pointed was to all intents and purposes, internally damned. Thus he went from one to another seeking up sinners, and ever the damnation of individuals—and the leaders all testified that the man was inspired, and it would not answer to step him, for that would be sinning against the Holy Ghost, which sin could not be pardoned. At night, however, or he was taken off the ground by his father and confined for a time. On Monday, another man by the name of Campbell got inspired, and went through similar performances, being followed by many others affected in the same way. It is impossible to describe the scene. Any person wearing a brazen, artificial flowers in their bonnets, or a safety chain of gold, or a gold watch, was pointed out as lost. These fanatics would fall on their knees, and demand of others to fall before them.

They pulled off brazen and finger rings and threw them away—broke up safety chains and scattered them to the winds. One lady was induced to take out a whole set of false teeth and throw them on the ground, which were stamped in the dirt. Others cut off their hair, which they were told was the devil's pull it out and triced to persuade their friends to do likewise. Two young ladies from Bridgeport were also inspired, and pronounced woe upon individuals who did not believe as they did, by pointing their fingers and making this muttering noise, growing, &c. &c. A Mr. minister of the Episcopal Church at _____, unbent the mind to make some confession, and declared that he should be no longer minister of that particular church, or any other, but should do what he could for this great cause.

He was pointed at, however, by the inspired man, and had to leave the stand. A Methodist minister, by the name of Fuller, and a Baptist by the name of Gregory, were both called over to eternal damnation by these inspired ones. They were, however, not so easily frightened. The Methodist Fuller, commenced praying:—For a while all went well—the Millerites crying "Glory," "Hallelujah," "Praise God," &c., till soon he prayed for the poor deluded ones who thought they were doing God's service and were not, asking that the devil might be cast out of them. Whereupon the Millerites cried, "Save him away! Save him!" "his damnation is sealed," and laid their hands upon him. Fortunately there was friends enough to protect him. The Millerite preachers said all this was the Spirit of God, till Litch, of the "Midnight Cry," saw how things were going, and announced from the stand, that these things were of the devil, and that the Millerites must leave the ground. One minister declared that the world would come to an end this year. "It was just as sure as preaching." Others of the Millerites said it would be the seventh month from March 1843. Others, that we should never see the 1st of October, 1843. But this meeting ended, and the inspired ones fled. It was well for them that it did, for the people were so accustomed to such measures as would protect their wives and daughters from the insults of these deluded men.

I have not told you the half, nor need I. Are these the doctrines of the Bible, and is this Millerism carried out?

"This was said to be the Millerites, one of the latter day signs and wonders which the world could not understand."

FOUNDERS.
The following speedy cure for a foundered horse, is from the South-western Farmer:
As soon as you find your horse is foundered, bleed him in the neck in proportion to the greatness of the founder. In extreme cases, you may bleed him as long as he can stand up. Then draw his head up, as common in drenching and with a spoon put a few drops of his tongue strong salt, until you get him to swallow one pint. Be careful not to let him drink too much. Then anoint around the edges of his hoofs with spirits of turpentine, and your horse will be well in one hour.
A founder pervades every part of the system of a horse. The plegm is secreted from the blood; the last arrest it from feet and limbs.
I once rode a hired horse 99 miles in two days returning him at the night of the second day; and his owner would not have known that he had been foundered if I had not told him and his founder was of the deepest kind.
I once, in a travel of 700 miles, foundered my horse three times, and I do not think that my journey was retarded more than one day by the misfortune, having in all cases observed and practiced the above prescription. I have known a foundered horse turned in at night on green feed. All founders must be attended to immediately.

NEW RECIPE.—PRESSED CITRUS.
Take some fine citron mellow; pare, core and cut them into long slices. Then weigh them, and to every six pounds of melon allow six pounds of the best loaf sugar, and the juice and yellow rind (pared of very thin) of four large fresh lemons; also half a pound of rice-ginger.
Put the slices of lemon into a preserving kettle; cover them with strong alum water, and boil them half an hour—or longer, if they do not look quite clear. Then drain them, lay them in a broad vessel of cold water, cover them and let them stand all night. In the morning tie the rice-ginger in a thin muslin cloth, and boil it in three pints of clear pump or spring water till the water is highly flavored. Then take out the bag of ginger. Having broken up the sugar, put into a clean preserving kettle, and pour the ginger water over it. When the sugar has all melted, set it over the fire, put in the yellow peel of the lemons, and boil and strain it till no more scum rises. Then remove the lemon peel, put in the sliced citrons, and the juice of the lemons, and boil them in the syrup till the slices are all transparent. But do not let them break. When done, put the citrons and syrup into a large tub, set it in a dry, cool, dark place, and leave it uncovered for two or three days till all the watery particles have exhaled. Afterwards put the slices carefully into wide-mouthed glass jars, and gently pour in the syrup. Lay inside of each jar upon the surface of the syrup and double white tissue-paper exactly to fit, and then close the lids of the jars. This will be found a delicious sweetmeat, equal to any brought from West Indies, and is well worth doing. We recommend it highly. The citron mellow is now brought to Philadelphia market in August.

NEW Method of Making Salt.—We are informed, says the Cincinnati Chronicle, that in digging one of the salt wells of the Kanawha, a vein of calcareous hydrogen (admirable gas) was struck, and that gas comes up in large quantities, mixed with the salt water. The proprietor has contrived to separate the gas from the water, and while the water is conveyed into the boilers through a set of pipes, the gas is conveyed in another set, under the boilers, where it is inflated, and evaporates the water! Thus the same work yields the water to make salt, and the gas to evaporate it! We are informed that this is a truly manufactured at this well, the net cost of two tons is probably 10 cents, and it will be worth more than a silver mine.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.
COUGH LOZENGES.
Which are the safest and most efficient remedy for Coughs, Colds, Consumption, Whooping Cough, Asthma, &c., ever offered to the public. They operate by promoting expectoration, allaying the irritation of coughing, and removing the cause of the disease.
WORM LOZENGES.
The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.
CATHARTIC LOZENGES.
For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, Indigestion and nervous affections generally, Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dissipation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.
The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.
FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.
A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.
SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

Unhappy Spain seems destined to continue a scene of strife, if not of civil war. The Christian, or rather the Anti-Regent party, are in possession of the capital, which is now in ruins; but this is far from being the case in the provinces. The conduct of Espartero is inexplicable. Instead of trying to make the best compromise, with his opponents, now that the Queen and the capital are in their possession, he continues to hold out, with the troops who adhere to him, and at last accounts was actually spreading devastation in the suburbs of Seville by bombardment. This city holds out determinedly against him, and Narvaez has dispatched a body of troops to relieve it. If they should proceed vigorously, there is every probability that Espartero and Van Halen may be taken prisoners, and if that should happen, we fear that they will not be over long in dealing with the Cortes, for the purpose of settling the administration of the law throughout the kingdom. There appears to be great need of this, as in many of the provinces separate juntas, or republics, are being formed. The ex-Queen Christina is talked of as being about to re-enter the country; but there is every reason to believe that she will, for some time at least, remain in her present quarters at Paris.

EXTRAORDINARY OCCURRENCE.—On Saturday last, Clogher market-day, a boy was leading a horse up the street, and just as he was a few paces above the Lord Bishop's gate, the earth opened in the spot he was then standing on, and the horse was swallowed! The opening, it is said, is ninety-six feet in depth, and about six feet in breadth. By means of ropes and windlasses the horse was got up, but was injured a little by the fall. The hole remains yet to be seen. Some people may think this is absurd; but they may rely on it as a fact. There can be no cause assigned for the chasm, as the street round it is hard and firm.—A Correspondent of Nearly Telegraph.

Indolence.—"If you ask me," said Zimmerman, "which is the real hereditary sin of human nature, do you imagine I shall say pride, or luxury, or ambition, or egotism? No! I shall say indolence. Who conquers indolence, will conquer all the rest. Indeed all good principles must stagnate, without mental activity."

Sweet Corn for Winter.—Reader, did you preserve any sweet corn for winter's use, as we advised last year? If you did not, you cannot possibly know what you lost. If you did, you will do it again. If you did, and do not do it this year, you will be an object of pity.

Take corn fit for boiling—scald it about ten minutes—then cut it from the cob—spread it on tins, and dry it either in the sun or by the stove. It should be frequently stirred, and should dry fast, that it may not sour. Cooked in the winter it is—try it.—Prairie Farmer.

To Pickle Tomatoes.—Take those which are ripe, and cut them into thick slices; let them lie, after being sliced, several hours; then pour off the juice which has exuded from them, put them in a jar, and pour over them sugar dissolved in vinegar, in the ratio of a pound of sugar to a pint of good vinegar, seasoned with spices to suit the taste. They will keep as long as you wish; and the lady who furnished us this recipe says they are delicious.—Prairie Farmer.

GRANT & WATT, Tailors, Main St., Nauvoo, Illinois; Are in receipt of the Eastern quarterly fashions, and will do all jobs in the nearest possible manner, and on the most reasonable terms.

All country orders promptly attended to.

IMPORTANT.—I would inform the citizens of Nauvoo, and vicinity, who have not paid their state and county tax which remain due and unpaid for the year A. D. 1843, that a list of said delinquents are left with me for collection. By calling at my house and settling the same forth with you will save cost.

LEWIS ROBINSON, Deft. Collector. Nauvoo, Sept. 4th 1843. no23-2w.

NOTICE.—ALL taxes for the year 1842, that remain due at the 25th October next, will be placed in the hands of an officer for collection, subject to the legal fees or constable.

FALL & WINTER READY MADE CLOTHING. At wholesale and retail. M. BROWN, at 52 Main street, St. Louis, has already received several shipments, and will continue to receive weekly fresh supplies of superior ready made clothing, the goods of which were bought at auction, for a cash, previous to the late advance on goods, and made up under his immediate direction by a wholesale clothing house in the city of New York, with which he is connected. His stock will be large, comprising every article kept in a clothing or furnishing store.

Having one of the best cutters in the United States to superintend that department, he is confident his garments will compare successfully with any in this city, in fashion, beauty, make or fit.

Persons visiting St. Louis for the purpose of replenishing their wardrobe, either in clothing or furnishing articles will do well to call on the subscriber where they will not only find the most fashionable and best made garments, but at prices decidedly lower than any other house in the city of St. Louis.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES. THESE celebrated Lozenges are now offered to the citizens of Nauvoo, and the West, as the best preparation (for the cure of the various diseases for which they are recommended) ever offered to the public. The proprietor, Dr. Sherman, is a regular graduate of Medicine, a member of the Medical Society of the city and county of New York, and these Lozenges are prepared from medical prescriptions which have been approved by the most celebrated physicians in that city; in addition to which they are prepared in so pleasant a manner that children eat them with avidity and civility more. They consist of COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES. The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPBOR LOZENGES. For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES. The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES. These Lozenges have been tested by a celebrated physician in a practice of twenty years, and have never been known to fail in removing the distressing disease. In addition to which, if the directions be followed, the disease will not return.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER. This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents,) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by J. SNIDER, (22-y1) Sole Agent for the City of Nauvoo.

FOR SALE. South west quarter of section 24, in township six north of range 8 west. This good. Terms easy; apply to L. E. REYNOLDS, Burlington Iowa. June 27th, 1843-1f.

ELECTRO-MAGNETIC GILDING AND PLATING in all its varieties at the New Brick Watch Shop, near the Temple, by Gustavus Hills. Watches—Old Gold and Silver in exchange for work.

THE FLIGHT OF TIME.

Time speeds away—away—away!
Another hour—another day—
Another month—another year—
Drop from us like the leaf to earth;
Drop like the life-bloom from our hearts;
The rose-bloom from the cheek decays,
The tress from the temple falls,
The eye grows dim and strange to all.

Time speeds away—away—away!
Like forests in a stormy day,
He undermines the stately tower,
Uproots the tree, and nays the flower,
And sweeps from our dust-acted breast
The friends that loved, the friends that blest,
And leaves us weeping on the shore,
To which they can return no more.

Time speeds away—away—away!
No eagle through the sky can fly,
No wind along the hills can flee,
No swiftly or so smoothly can he,
Like fiery steel—from scabbard to scabbard,
He hurls us on—from youth to age,
Then plunges in the fearful sea
Of thimble-aw Eternity.

MR. BENNETT'S LETTERS FROM EUROPE. No. IV.

LONDON, 1st Sept., 1843.
I returned to this metropolis a few days ago, after an extensive and interesting tour through Ireland, Scotland, and the north of England. I leave for Paris tomorrow, and may probably visit Baden before I return to New York, which I expect will be about the middle or end of Oct. ber.

You will have seen the singularly public position in which I have been placed before the English nation, by the work and foolish attack of Mr. O'Connell upon me, during my passage through Dublin. That attack, you will perceive, originated entirely in his extreme hatred and prejudice against the institutions of the Southern States—a prejudice which prevails here among the liberals and an called republicans, even more than among the whigs and Tories. I have been compelled to come out publicly in defence of myself and of the conduct of the U. States towards certain interests in Ireland and you will see my first letter in the Times of the 30th. This is only the commencement of a long contest against the traducers of America, on account of the slave institutions of the south, and knowing the character and chivalry of the Southern States, I shall not spare even O'Connell, if he continues to abuse them.

I am thus placed in this country, during my stay, in a more remarkable and conspicuous position than I ever expected to be, during a period too, when a great crisis has begun in this land.

The repeal agitation is only the beginning of a long movement which is intended to produce great changes, if not a revolution, in England. The present ministers are losing ground every day, and the great crisis of the age will be developed before long. Many of the false republicans of this land have, however, a deep jealousy and hatred of the United States—and why it is so, seems to be difficult to tell. But this prejudice is the cause of all the abuse of the social institutions of the Southern States, in which unfriendly business no man has been more conspicuous than Mr. O'Connell. The effect of my letter in the Times, in reply to his attacks on this point, has been interesting in several respects. I have been applied to by many persons of high character and position, friends of the United States, to write a book on that country, to give a correct view of American institutions, habits and progress. From what I am told, I suppose it would be a very profitable business, but I have no time yet to devote my attention to any thing out of the New York Herald. In the mean time I will think of these things, and prepare myself for the future. I have been forced by opposition into a conspicuous position, and I must maintain it with care and attention.

The relations between the two countries are in status quo. I understand from the best authority that Sir Robert Peel and the Chancellor of the Exchequer have been collecting information, relative to the terms of a new commercial treaty with the United States, but whether they will act very soon seems uncertain. I am very certain, however, that a strong feeling is growing up there among the leaders of both parties in favor of some new arrangements with the United States. Several negotiations have just begun in England—and particularly a free trade or low-tariff agitation in Liverpool. If the Peel ministry will not act, no doubt the Whigs, as soon as they get into power, will take a bold step in favor of the United States.

A paper on the agitation has also commenced in Birmingham—but that seems too absurd to succeed. Let them, however, enlarge their paper currently to England as much as they please—the consequence will be only to give the advantage to the United States in the markets of the world.

The evils of England, Ireland, Scotland, &c., cannot be alleviated by any laws that may be passed. The radical errors are unequal divisions of property and work—the expensive habits of the higher classes and the extreme poverty of the lower. The nobility, from their luxurious habits, are as much in debt as the nation—all are mortgaged, and a reduction of rent or taxes seems to be equally impracticable and impossible.

American credit seems still to be in the way of revival, although nothing very particular has taken place since my last. The Illinois Commissioners have not yet closed their arrangements, but I hope they will be able to do so very soon. The accounts from New York have been quite favorable of late, and I have no doubt its salutary effects will be felt on this side in a few months.

Mr. Macready goes out in the steamer that takes this—and Mr. Forrest, if he chooses, can have an engagement at Covent Garden. This will be a fair exchange, and we will see how each is received. Mr. Macready, as an artist, has occupied a high rank. He is a great friend of Charles Dickens, and how he may be received in the United States we will see. Maywood is flourishing at the Strand Theatre.

I was quite surprised to see Mr. Lowndes here, the great agent for the Wall street banks for catching and convicting forgers and counterfeiters. His famous arrest and conviction of Monroe Edwards sinks into nothing before his recent achievement. He has at last caught here, John Reed, of the curious glass eye, who committed the famous series of forgeries from New Orleans to New York, amounting to $55,000. This is the same man who forged on Jacob Little & Co. for $22,000. He is now safe in prison here, having been identified the other day at Newgate by Ben. L. Hays, who has returned to the United States. Mr. Lowndes is now engaged in demanding him of the British Government under the new treaty, but as the forgery was committed before the treaty was made, some doubt may be entertained whether he will be delivered up. I think he will be delivered up, and will find a home with Colonel Edwards at Sing Sing. His locus in quo was discovered through the agency of the Baring's, and in consequence of certain Treasury Notes, issued by Baker, of Philadelphia, marked "without recourse." Only $13,000 of the money has been found upon him, for he has been living two years in London, and has lost some of it in speculations. He has his accomplice with him here, whose name and history I know, but as he is not yet caught, I forbear mentioning any thing on that point.

Dickens has published another number of Chuzzlewit, cutting up and satirizing under feigned names, all those fools, both male and female, who crowded his lives during his first visit to New York. I have enjoyed it very much—nor do I care how much he cuts and carves up the fools who paid court to him as they did. I hope this number will be published extensively.

This morning we had an order from the Lord Chamberlain to see Buckingham Palace. We went through all the apartments—drawing rooms—drawing rooms—yellow drawing rooms—picture gallery, &c. &c. The paintings are most beautiful—and the little shade under the trees where the Queen and Prince Albert breakfast in the summer mornings, is most picturesque and inviting. A further account hereafter. After this we rode to the famous manège, or riding school, where the nobility are taught to manage the horse. It is kept by Mr. Davis, the uncle of Mr. Davis, of New York, and is most superior in its horses and other appointments. Here I was told that Mr. Davis in New York, formerly the riding-master at Disbrow's school in the Bowery, is one of the most capable and competent trainers and teachers of the horse in Europe. At this manège, they know our New York Davis well, and his reputation is very high.

Post Edit.—This disease, says the Southern Planter, has generally been considered incurable, but Mr. Samuel Terril, of Carolina, an old gentleman of the highest respectability, called at our office a few days since, to say that he had an unfailing remedy in the little ever green, commonly called the ground ivy. The leaf is gathered and dried before the fire until it can be pounded; when a table spoonful is mixed with an equal quantity of slacked lime, the swelling having been laid open to the bone, the mixture is laid on the wound and kept to its place by a bandage. Mr. Terril says that he has used it himself, and that he has known it frequently used by others, and that in no instance has the first application failed to effect a cure.—Galena Sentinel.

We see by our exchanges that the Irish Arms Bill passed the House of Commons on the 6th ult. by 125, votes 50. Thus every Irishman in Ireland will be denied the privilege of keeping a gun unless endorsed with the Queen's stamp.—Sentinel.

Hard to Get.—An editor down east advocates for a devil of good moral character.

The amount of money coined at the New Orleans Branch Mint, during the month of August last, was:
Of silver, $380,000
Of gold, 101,000
Total, $481,000
Making the total amount coined since January last $3,719,000.

Wounds in Horses.—Take one quart of a pound of spirits, half a pint of vinegar, half pint of spirits of turpentine—put them together in a bottle, and shake up before using. Apply to the wound with a feather three times a day.—Central New York Farmer.

My system is to work a tree just as I do the corn plant; the one is an annual, the other a perennial; give the tree all the cultivation it is to have while young, and when the tree puts on the appearance of premature decay, I give it a coat of manure spread upon the surface of the ground; this I apply in the fall of the year always preferring long to short manure, and when asher are deemed necessary I have put them on in the spring.—Correspondence of the Albany Cultivator.

A second revolution in Hayti is now progressing. The rebels are principally composed of blacks, who desire to overthrow the mulatto government recently organized. Several skirmishes have occurred between the two forces. In one fight the blacks had one hundred and five killed. Aux Cayes is under martial law, and there appears every reason to apprehend a protracted struggle between the two classes of people. The blacks are headed by "King Solomon the first," and his two sons.—N. Y. Sun.

Serious Riot in Canada.—We learn from the Montreal Herald of the 15th inst., that another serious outbreak has occurred in the vicinity of Miramichi. The paper states that "a number of persons who had gone from Newcastle to Chatham, to divine service, were forcibly dragged out of the church by a band of ruffians, and cruelly beaten. Some of the ringleaders were arrested by the civil force, but they were soon rescued, and an express sent to Newcastle for the military.

A detachment was immediately embarked, and proceeded by the steamer St. George to Newcastle, and arrived there about midnight. On the arrival of the troops, they found the rioters to the number of about 400 assembled, armed with muskets and two field pieces, and declared their intention to resist to the last extremity, and they were holding their ground when the mail came away.

It was added that it was feared the arrest of the parties implicated in this outrage would not be effected without great loss of life, that several outrages on private individuals, of a very gross character, had been committed, that the whole of the community of Miramichi, seemed to have gone mad, and that the conduct of all parties were equally disgraceful. We wait anxiously for further particulars.

Things to be Remembered.—Horses should never be put to severe work on a full stomach. More horses are hurt by hard driving after a full feed than by a full feed after hard driving.

If the farmer wishes to have his pork barrel and meal chest hold out, let him look well to his kitchen garden. Plants of vegetables conduce not more to health than to profit.

In laying in a stock of winter fodder for animals, let it not be forgotten that a little too much is just enough. Starving animals at any time is a miserable policy.

As you treat your land so it will treat you. Feed it with manures liberally and it will yield you bread bountifully.

Avoid debt as you would the leprocy. If you are ever tempted to purchase on credit put it off for three days. You need time for reflection.

Never beg fruit or any thing else you can produce by the expenditure of a little time or labor. It is as reasonable to expect a man to give away the produce of his wheat field as of his orchard or fruit garden.

The man who uses good seed, has a good soil, and works it in a good season rarely fails of having a good crop to reward his toil.

Never forget your word. The saying is in truth of any farmer, his word is as good as his bond, is worth more to him than the interest of ten thousand dollars annually.—Albany Cultivator.

It was reported at Lion by a merchant vessel, that the Bey of Tunis had been murdered by his nephew.

THE CASTLE OF THE CATIVE.

The thunders of Achmet Pacha's artillery ceased to shake the towers of Temeswar, which the rebel Suli Bey had long held out against the Porte. The fortune of the day had been decided by the fall of part of the fortifications; and the young and fiery General of the Sultan's troops, bearing down all opposition, made himself master of the fortress, and pursued Suli Bey into his harem, whither in despair he had taken refuge.

The helpless and affrighted females crowded around their master with loud cries for protection when they saw the hitherto inviolate portals of their apartments burst open by the fierce Achmet. The wretched Suli Bey, prostrating himself on the ground, buried his face in his garments, and awaited his fate in silence.

Achmet, whose first intention had been to plant his foot on his body and strike off his head, felt his arm arrested in spite of himself, by the glance of a dark eyed slave. The silent language in which the emotions of the soul are conveyed, is understood by all, and Achmet read in the eyes of Camilla such horror and detestation of the deed he was about to perform, that although he would not own to himself that her opinion was of the slightest importance, he suffered that look to change his purpose; and instead of becoming himself the executioner of Suli Bey he ordered one of his mutes to perform his will upon him.

The awful silence that followed this transaction was succeeded by the frantic outcries of the ladies of the harem, who full of terror for their own safety, hastened to implore mercy of their new lord. Achmet condescended to return his cry to its sheath, and assure them of their security. No sooner did they perceive his gracious demeanor, than they began to address him with the most highflown terms of flattery, and each strove by every possible means to attract his attention.

Achmet could not help being struck by the contrast Camilla presented, who stood proudly aloof with two of her countrywomen. The haughty conqueror felt mortified that the fair Castilian did not join in the homage paid him by the other ladies, whom by the richness of their dresses, he perceived had been considered as her superiors, in the estimation of Suli Bey.

"Slave," said he approaching her, "wherefore is it that you have not joined with your companions in paying your duty to me?"

"Because I owe you none," answered Camilla.

"Dare you thus reply to the conqueror of Temeswar? Do you not know that your very existence is in my hands?"

"I am aware of it," replied Camilla, raising a pair of radiant dark eyes to his face.

"Then why do you not fall at my feet and ask your life?"

"It is not worth the trouble."

"You are a daughter of Frangistan, as I perceive by your rebellious spirit?"

"I am."

"And a Christian?"

Camilla made the sign of the cross. Achmet spit upon the ground.

"It must be confessed," said Camilla, reddening indignantly, "that you Turks are the most disgusting people under the sun."

"Slave!" cried Achmet, "if your anger did not become you so well, I would command my black eunuch Puffin, to chastise you for your insolence!"

"And even if you were to commit such an outrage, I could hardly think worse of you than I do at present," returned Camilla, bursting into tears.

"What is it that you think of me?" asked the Pacha.

"That you are an unmanly ruffian whom I hate but do not fear!" replied the Castilian, her eyes flashing through her tears as she spoke.

Achmet knew not how to answer the beautiful vixen. To conceal his perplexity, he turned to Antonio and Beatrice Manzares, her fellow captives.

"And ye, whom I perceive to be the countrywomen of this contumacious slave, are you of a like spirit?"

They looked in great embarrassment from the Pacha to Camilla, and remained silent.

"How," exclaimed Achmet, angrily, "when I speak to the meanest of my slaves, am I not deemed worthy of a reply?"

"My cousins do not understand the odious jargon in which you address them, and are therefore unable to appreciate your courteous and obliging speeches," replied Camilla, dryly.

"How comes it then that you not only comprehend every word I say, but are so ready with your provoking replies?"

"Because I have labored indefatigably to attain fluency in the Turkish language while in captivity!"

"And what might be your motive for taking so much trouble?"

"Merely that I might have the satisfaction of speaking my mind on occasion," replied Camilla, with the sauciest glance at him imaginable.

It must be owned that you have enjoyed that pleasure very fully to night, said the Pacha, laughing. But did you ever reply to Suli Bey in this manner?"

"He never gave me any opportunity by pestering me with his conversation and company."

"How then did he comfort himself?"

"Positively I am tired of your eternal question and will answer you no more to night."

"Am not I your master, wayward thing?—Can I not force you to do anything I choose?"

"No you cannot make me talk unless it pleases me. My head aches with the uproar you have made in battering the Derwent about our ears, and I am fatigued with your conversation. I wish you would leave me and attend to those ladies who are taking such pains to attract your notice."

"Oh, Prophet! is it come to this? Is the conqueror of the warlike Suli Bey dictated to by one of his slaves?"

"More extraordinary things than that happen every day mighty Pacha," replied Camilla with composure.

"Do not think perverse one, that your charms are to excuse your impertinence. Most of these fair Circassians are more beautiful than yourself yet they extol me above all the heroes of the east, and rejoice in the good fortune that has transferred them from Suli Bey to the great Achmet."

"And did you believe one word they say?"

"Why should I not? demanded Achmet much mortified.

"Do you think the ladies of your own harem could be sincere in praising and caressing a man who had murdered you an hour before?" said Camilla.

"Mighty Prophet! no, but is there no difference between Suli Bey and Achmet?"

"Yes—a very great difference, Suli Bey was a much handsomer man, said Camilla, with a provoking smile."

"This is past bearing!" exclaimed Achmet, stamping; "I will teach you that you have a master! So saying he withdrew, darting at her an angry glance."

"Ah, imprudent Camilla! what have you been saying to put that terrible Turkey man in such a fury?" cried Antonio, in great alarm. Though I could not understand a word of your conversation I knew by the sparkling of your eyes that you were exasperating him, and trembled lest you should go too far."

"How could you venture to converse with Achmet after the fate of Suli Bey? (who was, by the bye, just such another tiger as himself). For my part, I felt as if I were being strangled, all the time Achmet stood so near us."

"I expect nothing less but that he will cause you to be sewn up in a sack, and thrown into the river," cried Beatrice, weeping.

"Never fear, my gentle coz, this bloody minded Pacha, will do us no harm, though I doubt not he will attempt to frighten me into submission."

"Dearest Camilla I tremble for you. Oh, what a sad day it was, that threw us into the hands of that villainous corsair."

"Who sold us to Suli Bey with as little remorse as if we had been three puppies," answered Camilla.

"Come cheer you, dear Beatrice, continued Camilla, I will venture to pledge my word that through my means you will be restored to your native country, and to Henriquez and Antonio to Diego."

"Fine things to be effected by a damsel in your predicament!" sobbed Beatrice, weeping and hanging about Camilla, as Puffin approached to separate her from them.

"Courage! sweet cousin, fear not for me—I have no fears for myself, said she embracing them, and now, my good old soul! whether are you going to take me? continued she, as Puffin proceeded to lead her from the apartment."

Puffin rolled his eyes all only the whites were visible, as he replied, where I would not go for all the pearls in Lalla Delia's necklace. But if you offend my lord, it is meet you take the consequence."

Camilla, who expected something terrible in this prelude, was not so much shocked as Puffin expected; on being conducted into a gloomy cell vaulted chamber, lighted by a small grating near the roof, and containing no other furniture than a wretched sofa. Puffin pointed to the pitcher of water and a plate of rice, which was placed in a corner, and withdrew.

"During Camilla's imprisonment it was in vain that Achmet sought the society of the ladies of his harem. The spirited and charming Castilian had made an impression on his heart and fancy that he never before experienced; restless and discontented, he could know no happiness but in the presence of her who had captivated him. At the end of the third day he could not forbear visiting her. As he approached her cell, he heard her singing, in a voice of melody one of the exquisite airs of her native land. The lovely captive raised her eyes as Achmet entered, and her cheek flushed with a brighter vermilion as he approached her."

Suli Bey was a man of liberal temper compared to you, said she pointing to the pitcher and rice.

Achmet's brow darkened.—Always Suli Bey! cried he angrily; I could find it in my heart to send you to follow that accursed dead dog."

"Nay, mighty Pacha, that is a little further than your power extends. You may follow him yourself, peradventure; but I as a good Christian hope to go to a different place from that which I trust is prepared for such wretched misbelievers as Suli Bey and you."

"I see your impetuosity of speech is nowise tamed," said the Pacha; nevertheless, I will forgive all your perverseness, if you will sing me that sweet song once more."

"The prisoned bird doth oftentimes sing, it is true, but never at the bidding of its jailer," replied Camilla, looking up between the smiles and tears.

"The Pacha felt the magic of her smile, and the power of her tears, but he knew not how to dismiss the tone of mastery when speaking to a woman."

"Come my Princess, let us eat, drink and be merry," said the Pacha, placing her beside him on an embroidered sofa opposite to the banquet."

"I shall neither eat nor drink, for it is the virgins of St. Peter; nor am I disposed to sing or be merry," returned Camilla.

"Do you forget that I can force you to do as I command you, returned Achmet, with an indignant frown."

"No; you can neither force me to sing nor to be merry; but I will tell you what you can do—you can order your Aga and black slaves to put a bow-string about my neck, and strangle me as they did Suli Bey."

Suli Bey, again, exclaimed the Pacha, furiously—answer me one question—did you love that rebel?"

"No, I did not."

"Why then do you torment me with his name?"

"Because he is frequently in my thoughts."

"The other ladies of the harem have forgotten him, and I have succeeded to their love."

"Love, call you it?" exclaimed Camilla; "slaves that they are in mind, as in person—they know not the meaning of the word!"

"Perhaps I am as ignorant of your sort of love as you seem to consider my women," replied Achmet, thoughtfully.

"Oh! I doubt it not. I never heard of a Turk who had the least idea of what love meant."

"You shall tell me then, fair creature what it signifies, according to your ideas."

"It is, said Camilla, raising her bewitching eyes to his, an interest so absorbing, that a lover will always prefer the happiness of his beloved to his own. All passions are swallowed up for the happiness of loving, and would prefer dying with her, to living without her."

POETRY.

TIME.

Time speeds away—away—away;
Another hour—another day—
Another month—another year;
Drop from us like the leaflets of a tree;
Drop like the life-blood from our hearts;
The rose-bloom from the cheek departs,
The tresses from the temple fall,
The eye grows dim, and strange to all.

Time speeds away—away—away;
Like torrent in a stormy day;
He undermines the stately tower,
Uproots the tree, and snags the flower,
And sweeps from our distracted breast
The friends that loved the friends that blessed;
And leaves us weeping on the shore,
To which they can return no more.

Time speeds away—away—away;
No eagle through the sky of day,
No wind along the hill can flee,
So swiftly, or so smoothly as he.
Take fiery speed, from stage to stage,
He bears us on, from youth to age,
Then plunges in the fearful sea,
Of fathomless Eternity!

THE WEEPING MAIDEN.

I saw a fair maiden weeping,
Down by yon old oak tree,
One day when I was reaping—
The cause I fled to see.

She turned as I approached her,
Then blushing drooped her head,
While I in tones of kindness,
Unto the maiden said:

"What grieves thee, fair maiden;
Ah! maiden, tell me true,
Can sorrow rest within the breast
Of one so fair as you?"

"Yes! yes!" she cried, "kind stranger,
I've drunk of sorrow's cup;
Just now my way with ruthless hand,
Cut my new battle up!"

[From the Globe.]

ENGLAND MOVING ON OREGON.

The Edinburgh Review discusses, in an elaborate and able paper, the character of the Oregon Territory. It is represented as a "land of magnificent scenery and healthy climate, with limited agricultural capabilities, with a large proportion of unproductive soil, but with fertile ground enough to form the home of a new nation; poor in harbors and deficient in navigable rivers, but yet by no means inaccessible, and possessing an admirable geographical situation for commercial purposes."

It then thus discusses the question:

"WHO SHALL POSSESS THE OREGON?"

The land which is to command the North Pacific, and give the law to its myriad of islands, cannot long remain unoccupied. It calls loudly on those who have foresight—on those who can estimate the promise of the future—to forecast its destiny. The Americans never show themselves deficient in this branch of political wisdom. They are familiar with what we can scarcely realize—the rapid march of time in the Western world. Almost before we have satiated ourselves with the mere contemplation of a newly discovered portion of the wilderness—before its lines are mapped out, and the names of its natural features become familiar to our ears—the wilderness is gone, the mountains stripped of their forests, the rivers alive with navigation. The Far West will change as rapidly as the East has done. In the words of Washington Irving, "the fur-bearing animals extinct, a complete change will come over the scene; the gay fur-trapper and his attendants, decked out in wild array, and tinkling with bells and tinketry; the savage war-chief, plumed, and ever on the prowl; the trader's cavalcade, winding through defiles and over naked plains, with the stealthy war party lurking on its trail; the buffalo chase, the hunting camp, the mad carouse in the midst of danger, the night attack, the scamper, the fierce skirmish among rocks and cliffs—all this romance of savage life, which yet exists among the mountains, will then exist but in frontier story, and seen like the fictions of chivalry or fairy tale."

"Surely it behooves us, who have an interest in every new corner of the earth, to note the signs of these changes, and turn them to our profit when we may. And one thing strikes us forcibly. However the political question between England and America, as to the ownership of Oregon, may be decided, Oregon will never be colonized over land from the Eastern States. It is with the view of pointing out the entire distinctness of the two regions, that we have gone (perhaps at tedious length) into a description of the geographical peculiarities of the vast space which separates them. It is six or seven hundred miles from the Westernmost limits of the fertile part of the prairie, to the cultivated regions of the Columbia. Six months of the year, the whole of this space is a howling wilderness of snows and ten pests. During the other six, it exhibits every variety of hopeless sterility—plains of arid sand, deserts of volcanic rocks, hills covered with bitter shrubs, and snowy mountains of many days' journey; and its level part is traversed by the formidable predatory cavalry we have described—an enemy of more than Scythian savagery and endurance, who cannot be tracked, overtaken, or conciliated. We know and admire the extraordinary energy which accompanies the rambling habits of the citizens of the States; we know the feverish, irresistible tendency to press onward which induces the settler to push to the utmost limits of practicable enterprise, regardless of the teeming and inviting regions he may leave behind. Still with these natural obstacles between, we cannot but imagine that the world must assume a new face before the American wagons make plain the road to the Columbia, as they have done to the Ohio. In the mean time, the long line of coast invites emigration from the overpopulated shores of the Old World. When once the isthmus of Darien is rendered traversable, the voyage will be easier and shorter than that to Australia which thirty thousand of our countrymen have made in a single year. Whoever, therefore, are to be the future owners of the Oregon, its people will come from Europe. The Americans have taken up the question in earnest; their press teems with writing on the subject, we need only mention the able Memoir of Mr. Greenhow, translated to the Department of State, in which their claim is historically deduced with much ingenuity. French writers, as they may be supposed, are already advocating the American view. Let us abandon ours, from motives of justice, if the right be proved against us; from motives of policy, if it be proved in our favor; but not in mere indolence. Let us not fold our hands under the idle persuasion that we have colonies enough; that it is mere labor in vain to scatter the seed of future nations over the earth; that it is but trouble and expense to govern them. If there is any one thing on which the maintenance of that perilous greatness to which we have attained depends more than all the rest, it is colonization; the opening of new markets, the creation of new customers. It is quite true that the great fields of emigration in Canada and Australia promise room enough for more than we can send. But the worst and commonest error respecting colonization, is to regard it merely as that which it can never be—a mode of checking the increase of our people. What we want is, not to draw off dribbles from our teeming multitudes, but to found new nations of commercial allies.

"And, in this view, every new colony founded, far from diverting strength from the older ones, infuses into them additional vigor. To them, as well as the mother country it opens a new market. It forms a new link in the chain along which our commercial intercommunication is carried—touching and benefiting every point in the line as it passed. Thus, in former days, the prosperity of the West India islands was the great stimulus to the people of N. America; the newer colony of Canada has flourished through its connection with our settlement in the States; the markets of New Zealand and will excite production in Australia. The uttermost portions of the earth are our inheritance; let us not throw it away in mere supineness, or indifference to the wise conclusions of those sages of the discouraging school, who had they been listened to would have checked, one by one, all the enterprises which have brightened the face of the world in the last thirty years."

England must have Oregon as its colony, because "the mother country it will open a new market." "The uttermost portions of the earth (says the reviewer) are our inheritance; let us not throw it away in mere supineness!"

What a comment is this upon the conduct of our own Government, whose supineness left England in possession of Oregon! England has a foothold on all the shores of Asia and Africa—on a multitude of islands in the Atlantic and Pacific. It was the boast of Mr. Webster, when on some occasion eloquently displaying the power of England, that the roll of her drum was heard, from post to post, all round the earth; and the sun never set upon her flag, or left it in darkness. And yet, not content, England must have our only post and only river on the Western shore of our continent. It is "the uttermost portion of the earth" that remains to be colonized, and whereon she can build up a new nation, to open a new market to the mother country; and therefore she claims it as her inheritance.

It is a remarkable fact; that, in ousting the United States from Astoria and the Columbia river, Great Britain has not left the navy of the Union a port in any quarter of the Globe which it can enter without permission. Our national ships go to the Mediterranean; there they find that England's navy has islands, ports, and a home, but ours has none. All the immense sums of money which are expended in supplying our navy in Europe, go into foreign pockets, and give support to Government's hostile to our institutions. Our ships are sent to the West Indies, and to the East Indies; to S. America on the Atlantic, and S. America on the Pacific; to the coasts of Asia and of Africa; every where England's navy is found at home, in her own ports, and sustained by the guns of fortresses on shore; and it is so in the wide waste of waters that embrace New Holland, New Zealand, the Sandwich Islands, &c. But there is not a spot on any of these shores or seas where an American ship can find a shelter, or obtain provisions, but from a stranger, and under the guns of frowning batteries, with the match in the hands of rivals in commerce and competitors for naval ascendancy; and this antagonist has resolved that we shall resign to it the only port and the only river in the territory of Oregon! and Mr. Webster consented that this great question, involving so deeply our national honor and interest, should be postponed, while all the local matters affecting sectional feelings were quieted by a treaty, leaving England in possession of the disputed point. Who will say that Mr. Webster, the friend of England during the last war—is not still her friend in peace?

SOUTH PASS TO OREGON.

Report of an expedition to the country lying between the Missouri and the Rocky Mountains on the line of the Kansas and Great Plate rivers. By Lieutenant J. C. Fremont, of the corps of Topographical Engineers—pp. 208:

We left the party on the 4th of July, forty miles from the junction of the South Fork with the main channel of the Plate river. The encampment was near where the road crosses to the North Fork, and Lieutenant Fremont divided his party at his point. The main party under the command of Clement Lambert, were instructed to cross to the North Fork, and wait the arrival of their comrades at the American company's fort at the mouth of Larimie's fork. Lieutenant Fremont, with three men and the three Cheyenne Indians proceeded up the South Fork, with the view of reaching St. Vrain's fort, and proceeding thence northwardly, to Fort Larimie, there to meet his comrades. His general course was southwest along the river valley. On the 6th, crossed the bed of a stream dried up and filled with sand, in a grove of willows, near its mouth, were the remains of a considerable fort—constructed of trunks of large trees. It was apparently very old, and had probably been the scene of hostile encounters among the roving tribes. The timber appeared to have been once extensive, but now only a few trees existed—these were a kind of long leaved willow. Ten miles further reached the mouth of Lodge Pole Creek, a clear and handsome stream. The morpha was frequent among the ravines—but the sun flower was the characteristic; it loves the sandy soil. Antelope were tolerably frequent, but shy. Encamped on an island in the South Fork of the Plate; in latitude 40 degrees 51 minutes 17 seconds, longitude 103 degrees 17 minutes 47 seconds.

On the 7th a small drove of wild horses made their appearance; but an attempt to catch one by one of the Indians, failed. In the afternoon encountered a herd of buffaloes. Lieutenant Fremont thus describes a fight amongst the bulls:

THE BUFFALO FIGHT.

"In the course of the afternoon, dust rising among the hills at a particular place attracted our attention, and riding up we found a band of eighteen or twenty buffaloes engaged in a desperate fight. Though butting and goring were bestowed liberally and without distinction, yet their efforts were evidently directed against one, a huge gaunt old bull, very lean, while his adversaries were all fat and in good order. He appeared very weak, and had already received some wounds, and while we were looking on was several times knocked down and badly hurt, and a very few moments would have put an end to him. Of course we took the side of the weaker party, and attacked the herd, but they were so blind with rage that they fought on, utterly regardless of our presence, although on foot and on horseback we were firing in open view within twenty yards of them. But this did not last long. In a very few seconds we created a commotion among them. One or two which were knocked over by the balls jumped up and ran off into the hills, and they began to retreat slowly along a broad ravine to the river, fighting furiously as they went. By the time we had reached the bottom we had pretty well dispersed them, and the old bull hobbled off to lie down somewhere. One of his enemies remained on the ground where we had first fired upon them, and we stopped there for a short time to cut from him some meat for our supper."

In the afternoon passed the bed of a stream 100 feet wide, sunk 30 feet below the prairie, with perpendicular banks, perfectly dry. Encamped on the river, in latitude 40 degrees 33 minutes 36 seconds—longitude 104 degrees 21 minutes 13 seconds.

July 8, met with the traces of a large body of Indians; and shortly after, the alarm of "Indians" was sounded. In a few minutes 2 or 3000 Indians were pursuing the party from whom they endeavored vainly to escape. Preparations were then made for battle; but just as they were about to fire on the approaching chiefs, Maxwell recognized the leading Indian, and shouted to him in the Indian language "you're a fool, God damn you, don't you know me." Friendship being established, the Indians were ascertained to be a village of Arapahos. In a few minutes their women came galloping up, astride on their horses, and naked from their knees down, and their lips up. The chief of the Indians invited the party to his village. He said his people had been out in order to engage a band of buffalo which they had seen from the village. They had been all day endeavoring to get the wind of them, and intended to surround them. The following extract of the hunt is interesting:

SLAUGHTER OF A BAND OF BUFFALOES.

"In the meantime the slaughter was about to commence on the other side. So soon as they reached it, the Indians separated into two bodies. One party proceeded directly across the prairie toward the hills in an extended line, while the other went up the river, and instantly as they had given the wind to the herd, the chase commenced. The buffalo started for the hills, but were intercepted and driven back toward the river, broken and running in every direction. The clouds of dust soon covered the whole scene, preventing us from having any but an occasional view. It had a very singular appearance to us at a distance, especially when looking with the glass. We were too far to hear the report of the guns, or any sound, and at every instant, through the cloud of dust which the sun made luminous, we could see for a moment two or three buffaloes dashed along, and close behind them an Indian with his long spear, or other weapon, and instantly again they disappeared. The apparent silence, and the dimly seen figures flitting with such rapidity, gave it a kind of dreamy effort, and seemed more like a picture than a scene of real life. It had been a large herd when the chase commenced probably, three or four hundred in number; but, though I watched them closely, I did not see one emerge from the fatal cloud where the work of destruction was going on. After remaining here about an hour, we resumed our journey in the direction of the village.

Gradually as we rode on, Indian after Indian came dropping along, laden with meat, and by the time we had reached the lodges, the backward road was covered with the returning horsemen."

On the 9th of July caught the first glimpse of the Rocky Mountains, 60 miles distant. Could discern the snowy summit of Long's Peak. On the 10th reached St. Vrain's fort, situated on the South Fork of the Plate, immediately under the mountains, about 17 miles east of Long's Peak. Elevation above the sea, 5,400 feet. From this fort the fort at the mouth of Larimie's fork, the next point of destination, was nearly due north, distant about 125 miles, which they reached on the 15th July. On the day previous Lt. Fremont gives the following description of the illusive cities he passed by:

ILLUSIVE CITIES FORMED BY ROCK.

"The fork on which we encamped appeared to have followed an easterly direction up to this place, but here it makes a very sudden bend to the north, passing between two ranges of precipitous hills called, as I was informed Goshen's hole. I here is somewhere in or near this locality a place so called, but I am not certain that it was the place of our encampment. Looking back upon the spot at the distance of a few miles to the northward, the hills appear to shut in the prairie, through which runs the creek, with a semi-circular sweep, which might very naturally be called a hole in the hills. The geological composition of the ridge is the same which constitutes the rock of the Court-house and Chimney of the North fork, which appeared to me a continuation of this ridge. The winds and rains work this formation into a variety of singular forms. The pass into Goshen's hole is about two miles wide, and the hill on the western side imitates in an extraordinary manner, a very massive fortified place, with a remarkable fullness of detail. The rock is marl and earthy limestone, white, without the least appearance of vegetation, and much resembles masonry at a little distance; and here it sweeps around a level area two or three hundred yards in diameter, and in the form of a half moon, terminating on either extremity in enormous bastions. Along the whole line of the parapets appear domes and slender minarets, forty or fifty feet high, giving it every appearance of an old fortified town. On the waters of White river, where this formation exists in great extent, it presents appearances which excite the admiration of the solitary voyager, and form a frequent theme of their conversation when speaking of the wonders of the country. Sometimes it offers the perfectly illusive appearance of a large city, with numerous streets and magnificent buildings, among which the Canadians never fail to see their cabarets; and sometimes it takes the form of a solitary house, with many chambers, into which they drive their horses at night, and sleep in these natural defences perfectly secure from any attack of prowling savages. Before reaching our camp at Goshen's hole, in crossing the immense detritus at the foot of the Castle rock, we were involved amidst winding passages cut by the waters of the hill, and where, with a breadth scarcely large enough for the passage of a horse, the walls rise thirty and forty feet perpendicularly. This formation supplies the discoloration of the Plate."

The other branch of the party had arrived two days previous without accident, at the fort.

Lieutenant Fremont here inserts the Journal of the other party, kept by Mr. Preuss. In this Journal, the writer gives a brief description of the celebrated Chimney Rock, which they passed on the 9th. "It looked at the distance of 30 miles like what it is called, the long chimney of a steam factory establishment, or a shot tower in Baltimore." The rock is composed of marl and earthy limestone, and the weather is rapidly diminishing its height, which is now only 200 feet above the river. But a few years ago its height is said to have been 500 feet.

Lieutenant Fremont, and his party, met with a handsome reception at the fort, which is situated on the bank of Larimie's river, near the Plate. Elevation above the sea 4,470 feet. It was here that Lt. Fremont learned the further dangers that Indians were on the war path, directly on his route to the South Pass, in great numbers. Their vengeance was more deep in consequence of several severe battles with parties of the whites, in which they had lost many of their bravest men.

PLAN FOR THE RENEWED ACTION OF THE IRISH PARLIAMENT.

1. The Irish people recognize, acknowledge, maintain and will continually preserve and uphold upon the throne of Ireland, her Majesty Queen Victoria, hereditary descendant, of Ireland, and her heirs and successors forever. The people of Ireland recognize, acknowledge, maintain, and will continually uphold, all the prerogatives of her Majesty, and her heirs and successors, belonging to, and inherent in the imperial crown of Ireland; and they will true allegiance bear, pure, inviolable, to her majesty, heirs and successors forever.

2. The people of Ireland acknowledge and will maintain and preserve forever, the privileges hereditary and personal, of the peers of Ireland, together with the legislative and judicial authority of the Irish House of Lords, and the exercise of the prerogative in amending and limiting the peerage, as the same did of right exist before the year 1800.

3. The people of Ireland do firmly insist upon the restoration of the Irish House of Commons, consisting of 300 representatives of the Irish people, and claim in the presence of their Creator the right of the people of Ireland to such restoration. They have submitted Union as being binding as a law, but they declare solemnly that it is not founded on right, or on constitutional principle, and that it is not obligatory on conscience. They agree with the Tory Attorney General, Austin, that the only binding power of the Union is the strength of the English Domination. They also agree with him that resistance of the Union is the abstract of duty, and the exhibition of that resistance a mere question of prudence. They will therefore resist the Union by all legal, peaceful and constitutional means.

4. The plan for the restoration of the Irish Parliament is as follows: 1. That the county members should be increased to 173, in the manner hereafter specified. 2. That there should be 197 members returned from cities and towns, in the manner mentioned. 3. That the county of Carlow, being the only county in Ireland with less than 10,000 inhabitants, should get an increase of one member, so as to have three representatives; that every other county having above 100,000 inhabitants, should get an increase of two members; that every county ranging above 150,000 inhabitants should get an increase of three members; that every county ranging above 250,000 inhabitants should get an increase of four members. That the county of Tipperary, having more than 400,000 should get an increase of eight members.

That the county of Cork, having more than 700,000 inhabitants should get an increase of ten members.

5. With respect to towns and cities, it is proposed that the city of Dublin having more than 200,000 inhabitants should have eight representatives—four for the parts north of the Liffey and four for the parts south of the Liffey.

That the University of Dublin should continue, on the basis of its present constituency, to send two members.

It is proposed that the city of Cork, having more than 100,000 inhabitants, should send five members.

That the city of Limerick and the town of Belfast, having respectively more than 30,000 inhabitants, should send each four members.

It is proposed that the town of Galway and the cities of Waterford and Kilkenny having respectively more than 20,000 inhabitants, should send each three members to Parliament.

That other towns having about 7,000 inhabitants should send two members to Parliament; and the forty-nine other towns next highest in the ratio of population, should send one member each.

6. It is supposed that the right of voting should be what is called household suffrage, requiring six months' residence in the counties; with the addition in the towns of married men resident for twelve months whether householders or not.

7. It is proposed that the mode of voting for members of Parliament, should certainly be by ballot.

8. The monarch de facto of England, at all times hereafter, whoever he may be, shall be monarch de jure in Ireland. And so, in case of a future Regency, the Regent de facto in England to be Regent de jure in Ireland.

9. The connection between Great Britain and Ireland, by means of the power authority and prerogative of the Crown, to be perpetual and incapable of change, or any severance or separation.

The foregoing plan to be carried into effect according to recognized law and strict constitutional principle.

Signed by order,
DANIEL O'CONNELL.

AN HOUR DURING THE FRENCH REVOLUTION.

At that very hour in the room of the Jacobins surrounded by a dozen other patriots as remorseless as himself, sat a colossal man; his harsh features dilated by the wine he had drunk and his associates rude as Breton peasants. The glass was lifted in his hand, and with a voice of thunder he gave the toast, "May the body of the last king be burnt to ashes on the funeral pyre made with the last priest." It was the terrific Denton. The words were repeated with shouts and clamor by the party around him. At that very moment a dwarfish man, with a huge head, a mouth marked with the hardness of a vindictive temper, and an eye in which incipient madness already glared—without stockings and in white waistcoats dabbled with blood, sat in a cellar under the very Place du Carrouai, which afterwards beheld his drunken apoplexy, writing a recommendation that France should massacre two hundred thousand men to the names of her strangled freedom, with an exact calculation of the time requisite for the purpose. Marat! It was the singular Marat. At that very moment two members of the Assembly were perfecting a plan for the destruction of the monarchy, and the establishment of a dictatorship. The one was Maximilien Isidore Robespierre. He himself was to be the dictator. At that moment, in a little chamber of the palace, at Versailles, sat a kindly-looking old man, weeping. The father was weeping over the backsliding of his children, and the king over the treason of his people. It was the unfortunate Louis XVI. At that very moment, in a guily illuminated saloon of the same palace, two females were playing cards—the one was lovely and still youthful. She lost, and the three hundred louis were passed to her fair antagonist, who murmured many apologies, but yet took the notes proffered her. The loser was Marie Antoinette. At that same moment a beggar lay starving for lack of bread in the garden of the Tuilleries, while her wasted child pressed to her shrunken nipple, and tried the breast in vain. At that very moment a monk was unfracking himself, never to resume the coat of the Benedictines. A maiden, draped in far too Cyprian a style, was sitting near him; and wine and glass were on the table—he had discovered a better profession; and this was Talleyrand.—The Man of the People.

Those who are now cultivating farms on our prairies should remember that, if they wish their land to hold good and produce ten years hence as good crops as it now does, they should return to the earth at least as much as is taken from it. Rather, if possible, make your farms richer than wear them out by continual skimming them.

Great Britain.

By the steamer Acadia, which arrived at Boston the 3d instant in thirteen and a half days, we have Liverpool letters to the 19th ult. The Great Western left New York on the 31st of August, reached Liverpool on the 14th ultimo; the Hiberna which left Boston on the 1st, reached Liverpool the 13th ultimo, in eleven and a half days. The packet ship Sheffield reached Liverpool on the 10th; the Liverpool, on the 12th; the New York on the 14th, and the Siddons on the 15th.

Information by this arrival represents the state of trade in every part of the country as most encouraging. Confidence has been revived, foreign orders come pouring in, money is abundant, the home trade has received an impetus, and what is perhaps better than all, the harvest, thanks to the fine weather of the last few weeks, has been got in with safety, and is described as an average one. These combined circumstances have operated most favorably on the public mind. Commercially speaking, a better feeling prevails at the present moment than has existed for years. The cotton market has been most buoyant; it received a stimulus some two or three weeks back, when accounts came to hand that the cotton crop in the southern states had been seriously injured in the rain.

The proceedings at the Corn Exchange have not possessed more than the average interest. Money continues to roll in from America.

The non-arrival of the Overland Mail, which is now more than a fortnight beyond its time, has excited some uneasiness. The delay has occurred on the other side of Suez. The belief at present is, that the steamer has been beaten back by the monsoon, although there are other croakers who contend that worse than this has happened, that she has gone to the bottom.

The outrages in South Wales are on the increase.

The repealers of Liverpool had a meeting, which was addressed by a number of repealers from the Corn Exchange. D. O'Connell, jr. made an address and the meeting broke up in a general row, occasioned by an attack by the Orangemen, who were worsted in the conflict.

QUEEN VICTORIA'S VISIT TO

THE CONTINENT.
"One of the most pleasing as well as remarkable events of the age is the visit which the young and lovely Queen of England, accompanied by her consort, has just been paying to the king of the French, followed by a round of elegant and graceful hospitalities, in which the royal families of both countries, their countries, and their ministers have joined. These great drawbacks from the personal comfort of sovereigns, the ostentatious acting, which their high social position would seem to demand, did not find their way to the Chateau d'Eu, where all the persons assembled were seen in their natural characters, and where the crowned heads more especially appeared divested of all the formality appertaining to royalty. A more happy or a more convivial party, from all the accounts which have transpired respecting it, could not exist."

"Our little queen, in the exuberance of her spirits, seems bent upon enjoyment this season. Her majesty and the prince remained at Brighton till the following Tuesday, when they re-embarked, with the intention of paying a visit to the king of the Belgians at Ostend. Having passed the night of Walmer Castle (the residence of the Duke of Wellington as Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports) the royal squadron stood out to sea early the next morning; and the illustrious voyagers after a rough passage arrived in good health and spirits at Ostend, where King Leopold, accompanied by his queen, awaited their arrival. The royal party is to visit Bruges, Ghent, Brussels, and other famous cities of the Netherlands, all equally rich in historical recollections, and is not expected to return to England till towards the end of the present week."

Sketches of the Duke of Wellington and Lord Brougham, by Mr. O'Connell.

The Duke of Wellington talked of the people being plundered, but was not at the head of the army that stormed Badajoz and St. Sebastian? Was there no plunder there? He went over to Spain as the friend of the Spaniards; but did he prove the friend of the inhabitants of those devoted cities? "Oh, no!" continued the honorable gentlemen, "men of all ages—fathers of families, women, and children were massacred under circumstances, with the details of which I could not shock their ears. Plunderers" in his teeth. He first threatened to fight us—there is now an end to that—(cheers)—and he is now reduced to the alternative of sending us—may there never be an end of that. (Laughter.) What an absurd thing it was to see one of the statesmen of a great nation employed in scolding a nation! It is such things were of frequent occurrence, Great Britain, from being a mighty empire, would become a ridiculous bye word. The next topic which claimed a few words had reference to that miserable rotten rump of an old Brougham. (Much laughter.) The wretched old driver got up in the house of lords and talked of 1832 and 1833. He said he brought in a bill to change the venue from Ireland to England, which had the effect of quieting it is country; and that he was the person who would at the present crisis bring in a similar measure, which would be attended with a similar result. But how did he act? Why, he started up one night and moved that the bill be read a first, and followed it up by giving notice that it be read a second time. The next night came, and with it poor old Brougham, who said, "I find such a law as this is unnecessary, because there is one identical with it already on the Irish statute book." The poor old man! (A laugh.) Really something ought to be done to relieve the house of lords from his folly. Suppose they were to address to the house a respectful petition, begging of them not to let their names and titles be pledged. Who knows but he might then be consistent for five days, or seven, spend an entire week without contradicting himself? (Laughter.) He had possessed some talent formerly, but all that now remained was the impudence of a powerful mind without its reality. (Cheers.) He concluded by moving, "that it be referred to the committee to inquire whether some legal means could not be employed to address to the house of lords to apply to Lord Brougham to take the pledge." The motion having been seconded, was carried amid long and continued laughter.—London Times.

FRANCE.

The Journal des Chemins de Fer says: "An inventor announces that he has found a composition which will reduce to a mere trifle the price of rails for railroads. It replaces the iron by a combination of Kaolin clay (that used for making pottery and china) with a certain metallic substance, which gives a body so hard as to wear out iron, without being injured by it in turn; one hundred kilograms of this substance would cost less than fifteen francs, and would furnish two and a half metres of rail. The Kaolin clay is abundant in France, and the valley of the Somme contains immense quantities of it."

ITALY.

The most contradictory accounts respecting the insurrection in Bologna find their way abroad. The Allgemeine Zeitung of August 23d, has private advices by way of Cairo, which represent the disorders as important, and it names the chiefs: "The original leaders of the movement, among whom is the young Marchese Tanara, a Count Zimbardi, and a Piedmontese ex-officer, named Metra, have effected their escape. Now, the persons at the head of the insurrection are one Lambertini from Bologna, two brothers Muratori from Bassano, one of which is a physician, a corn dealer from Bizzano, and a man who was formerly a gendarme from Bologna."

SPAIN.

The new government of Spain is busily engaged in a conflict with the discordant elements which called it into being. Barcelona is in arms, and the expulsion of Espartero is likely to be succeeded by a singular civil war. The Port of Monja has been firing upon the Atrazazana. As the army cannot be depended upon, measures of extreme severity have been adopted to awe it into subjection. A battalion of the 3d regiment at Barcelona mutinied a few days ago, numbering about 500 men; it was feared that the example might be contagious. Narvaez promised, if they laid down their arms, they should have what they wanted; they did so, and a number were immediately placed under arrest, priests were introduced to them, and soon after, five sergeants, two corporals, and a private were let out and shot within sight of the barracks.

Espartero.—On Saturday the Regent of Spain left Mivart's hotel, accompanied by his secretary, on a visit to her Majesty at Windsor. He left the hotel in a brougham, after which he proceeded by the one o'clock train to Slough, where a carriage was in waiting to convey his Highness to Windsor Castle. After being introduced by the Earl of Aberdeen to her Majesty, he had a lengthened audience with her and Prince Albert, after which he returned to town at five o'clock. He maintains the greatest privacy, and the only persons who dine with him, are the members of his suite.

By the latest accounts from Spain we learn that the new Government is pursuing a very illiberal and vindictive line of policy, inasmuch that it is excommunicating all the adherents of Espartero from office, titles, &c., and enforcing by the most peremptory orders obedience to its dictates. If Espartero was but this military despotism appears to be much worse.

Her Majesty and Prince Albert proceeded on Monday morning, at half past 8, to Southampton, by railway, for the purpose of embarking in the new royal steam yacht the Victoria and Albert, on a marine excursion.

Further Particulars of the Great Fire in Jamaica.—We have received some additional and very interesting particulars of the terrible fire in Kingston, Jamaica, the first account of which was published exclusively in the Herald.

The particulars we now give were written on the 3d inst., and are certainly graphic. They show what philanthropy is doing for Jamaica:—

"The whole city is in great distress—there are about five thousand persons without a roof over their heads.—An awful conflagration broke out on the 20th at 4 o'clock in the morning, at the east end of Kingston, when the sea breeze blew a perfect hurricane, and roged with fury throughout the day, defying all attempts to extinguish it. The flames and smoke were to be seen at a distance of 60 miles. At about six o'clock, P. M., it reached the Catholic chapel at the upper end of the parade, and reduced that to a heap of ruins in a very short time. About that time the wind changed to the north, and the course of the fire was altered, and began to return to the lower end of the town, taking a new path however. About midnight it reached within a few houses of ours, on the opposite side of the street. The Magistrates then ordered the houses over the way to be blown up, in order to save Port Royal street; but it was found impossible to blow them up, as all the powder in the city had been used in the course of the day to bombard the other buildings, and it was only with the assistance of the soldiers, and sailors of the ships of war that they were pulled down. The fire then abated somewhat, and was extinguished at about 4 o'clock on the evening of the 27th. I saw you a newspaper by which you will see the almost incredible number of blocks and buildings destroyed. The engines were all broken. The negroes would not save anything except the Baptist and Methodist chapels. At four o'clock in the afternoon, I went on the Parade and found it covered with a mass of furniture—the negroes all standing in the streets and upon the parade, talking, laughing, and joking—some crying and others stupefied. The soldiers and sailors tearing down on one side of the Parade, throwing out the furniture and trying uselessly to stay the progress of the flames. There were bells ringing, drums beating, bombs and cannon firing at the houses, women and children screaming, and the whole presented a scene of distress, terror and confusion, which defies description. The destruction of property was enormous. I saw splendid pianos thrown from the balconies and dashed into a thousand pieces. In returning from a walk in the suburbs at six o'clock on the evening of the 27th, I found some streets actually on fire and no one stirring near them—the houses deserted, and the people congregated about the principal scenes of devastation. The ruin is dreadful.—I am so agitated and hurried that I can write no more."

The Kingston Journal of the 1st inst., entreats the citizens of Kingston not to give way to their fears of outrages on the part of the idle and diabolically minded men who are to be found in that city. He admits that the plunder of property during the fire was immense, but attempts to console his readers with the consideration that part of the plunder had been recovered. He says he cannot venture to assert there is no danger, (of a general rise and sick, we presume,) but thinks it imprudent to show their fears.

The editor of the Jamaica Despatch declares that had it not been for the municipal guard, the city, in addition to the horrors of conflagration, would have become the theatre of rapine and desolation. The fire extended over 25 squares, and destroyed more than 500 houses, besides outbuildings. The loss may be estimated at $3,000,000 or $4,000,000.

This dreadful, desolating fire was caused by the British Government through the instrumentality of their blacks in Jamaica. That government paid $100,000,000 towards the destruction of Kingston, one of the finest Colonial cities in its possession. What folly! What madness!

INDIAN ANECDOTES.

Wit.—An Ottawa chief, known to the French by the name of Whitejohn, was a great drunkard. Count Frontenac asked him what he thought brandy to be made of; he replied, that it must be made of hearts and tongues—"For," said he, "when I have drunken plentifully of it, my heart is a thousand strong, and I can talk, too, with astonishing freedom and rapidity."

Honor.—A chief of the Five Nations, who fought on the side of the English in the French wars, chanced to meet in battle his own father, who was fighting on the side of the French. Just as he was about to deal him a deadly blow upon his head, he discovered who he was, and said to him, "You have once given me life, and now I give it to you. Let me meet you no more; for I have paid the debt I owed you."

Justice.—A missionary residing among a certain tribe of Indians, was one day, after he had been preaching to them, invited by their chief to visit his wigwam. After having been kindly entertained, and being about to depart, the chief took him by the hand and said, "I have very bad squaw. She had two little children. One she loved well, the other she hated. In a cold night, when I was gone hunting in the woods, she shut it out of the wigwam, and it froze to death. What must be done with her?" The missionary replied, "She must be hanged." "Ah!" said the chief, "go, then, and hang your God, whom you make just like her."

Magnanimity.—A hunter, in his wanderings for game, fell among the buck settlements of Virginia, and by reason of the inclemency of the weather, was induced to seek refuge at the house of a planter, whom he met at his door. Admission was refused him. Being both hungry and thirsty, he asked for a morsel of bread and a cup of water, but was answered in every case, "Not you shall have nothing here! Get you gone, you Indian dog!"

It happened, in process of time, that this same planter lost himself in the woods, and, after a fatiguing day's travel, he came to an Indian's cabin, into which he was welcomed. On enquiring the way, and the distance to the white settlements, being told by the Indian that he could not go in the night, and being kindly offered lodging and victuals, he gladly refreshed and reposed himself in the Indian's cabin. At the morning he conducted him through the wilderness, agreeably to his promise the night before, until they came in sight of the habitations of the whites. As he was about to take his leave of the planter, he looked him full in the face, and asked him if he did not know him. Horror-struck at finding himself thus in the power of a man he had so inhospitably treated, and dumb with shame on thinking of the manner it was required, he began at length to make excuses, and beg a thousand pardons.

When the Indian interrupted him and said, "When you see poor Indians fainting for a cup of cold water, don't say again, 'Get you gone, you Indian dog!'" He then dismissed him to return to his friends.—My authorities, "It is not difficult to say, which of these two had the best claim to the name of Christian."

Deception.—The captain of a vessel, having a desire to make a present to a lady of some fine oranges which he had just brought from the sugar islands, gave them to an Indian in his employ to carry to her. Let her should not perform the office punctually, he wrote a letter to her, to be taken along with the present, that she might detect the bearer, if he should fail to deliver the whole of what he was intrusted with. The Indian, during the journey, reflected how he should refresh himself with the oranges, and not be found out. Not having any apprehension of the manner of communication by writing, he concluded that it was only necessary to keep his design secret from the letter itself, supposing that would tell of him if he did not; he therefore laid it upon the ground, and rolled a large stone upon it, and retired to some distance, where he regaled himself with several of the oranges, and then proceeded on his journey. On delivering the remainder and the letter to the lady, she asked him where the rest of the oranges were; he said he had delivered all; she told him that the letter said there were several more sent; to which he answered that the letter lied, and she must not believe it. But he was soon confronted in his falsehood, and, begging forgiveness for the offence, was pardoned.

Equality.—An Indian chief, on being asked whether his people were free answered, "Why not, since I myself am free, although their king?"

Tolerance.—In the year 1791, two Creek chiefs accompanied an American to England, where, as usual, they attracted great attention, and many flocked around them, as well to learn their ideas of certain things as to behold the savages. Being asked their opinion of religion, or of what religion they were, one made answer, that they had no priests in their country, or established religion, for they thought, that, upon a subject where there was no possibility of people's agreeing in opinion, and as it was altogether a matter of mere opinion, it was best that every one should paddle his canoe his own way. Here is a volume of instruction in a short answer of a savage!

Justice.—A white trader sold a quantity of powder to an Indian, and imposed upon him by making him believe it was grain which grew like wheat, by sowing it upon the ground. He was greatly elated by the prospect, not only of raising his own powder, but of being able to supply others, and thereby becoming immensely rich. Having prepared his ground with great care, he sowed his powder with the utmost exactness in the spring. Month after month passed away, but his powder did not even sprout, and winter came before he was satisfied that he had been deceived. He said nothing; but some time after, when the trader had forgotten the trick, the same Indian succeeded in getting credit of him to a large amount. The time set for payment having expired, he sought out the Indian at his residence, and demanded payment for his goods. The Indian heard his demand with great complacency; then, looking him shrewdly in the eye, said, "Me pay you when my powder grow." This was enough. The guilty white man quickly retraced his steps, satisfied, we apprehend, to balance his account with the chagrin he had received.

Hunting.—The Indians had methods to catch game which served them extremely well. The same month in which the Mayflower brought over the forefathers, November, 1620, to the shores of Plymouth, several of them ranged about the woods near by to learn what the country contained. Having wandered farther than they were apprized, in their endeavor to return, they say, "We were shrewdly puzzled, and lost our way. As we wandered, we came to a tree, where a young sprit was bowed down over a bow, and some acorns strewed underneath. Stephen Hopkins said, it had been to catch some deer. So, as we were toiling at it, William Bradford being in the rear, when he came looking also upon it, and as he went about it, gave a sudden jerk up, and he was immediately caught up by the legs. It was (they continue) a very pretty device, made with a rope of their own making, [of bark or some kind of roots, probably,] and having a noose as artificially made as any rope in England can make, and as like ours as can be; which we brought away with us."

WOOD! WOOD!!
WE would respectfully notify those who have promised us wood, that we are in want of it; and if they are willing to fulfil as they were to make promise, we shall be supplied with an abundance of this indispensable article soon. Persons wishing to become subscribers to the Times and Seasons, or Neighbor, can now have the opportunity of doing so by leaving their names at our office, and forwarding the amount in wood.

TAYLOR & WOODRUFF.

EMIGRATION continues to flow into our city, and the present high state of the river does away with that great obstruction to travelling which the rapids present in low water.

THE WEATHER begins to be cold. Jack Frost has made his appearance several times of late, and we begin to have broad hints of the near approach of winter.

OUR CITY is progressing rapidly in improvement wherever we turn our attention, brick houses are going up; tradesmen of all kinds seem to be full of employment, particularly those that are in any way connected with building.

Gov. AUGUSTUS C. DODGE has been elected delegate from Iowa by a majority about the same as that of his father in Wisconsin. Thus Father and Son go together to the councils of the nation.

It would seem from a letter of a correspondent of the Chicago Democrat, that the commissioners sent to negotiate the canal loan have succeeded in inducing certain capitalists to send out an agent to enter into the preliminary arrangements for the re-commencement of the work.

It appears that we made a mistake respecting Elias (surnamed) Lunson, in stating that he was Elijah; we should have said that he was only a prophet like unto Elijah, and as he wishes the public to be better acquainted with him, we publish the following through his request:

TO ALL PEOPLE.

I, Siles, being called to like the son of Man coming with the clouds of Heaven, am chased out of the woods by thieves and robbers, who are wolves in sheep's clothing, these Foxes have holes, and these birds of the air have nests, but I, like the son of Man, have not where to lay my head. They being deceived with a lie, I being grieved with their filthy conversation, call for ten men out of all languages of the nations and people of the earth, who are filled with the Holy Ghost, to take hold with me, and have the scriptures of Moses, the prophets and apostles of Christ translated into a pure language, that the people of all nations may call upon the name of the Lord, to serve him with one consent, and so make the light and day of Christ appear to all who look for it, without sin and unto salvation. This will save them from like great tribulation of which John spoke, and wash their robes through, with, or by the word or blood of Christ. Written from Marfreesborough, Tennessee, by me.

SILAS (surnamed) LAMSON.

Editors will do a kindness to all mankind to let this fly through all nations.—

There will be arrangements made for a meeting up in the mountains and in the desert places, by which knowledge will be increased by many from afar.

Puseyism.—In the pastoral letter of the Catholic Bishops, lately assembled in council at Baltimore, there is the following passage. Speaking of Puseyism, they say: "We will of course be understood to allude to the spread of what are called 'Puseyite doctrines' among the English clergy; with the nature of which we must suppose our readers already acquainted, and of which, therefore, we shall merely say that, on almost all points in which we and Protestants differ, they are only to be distinguished from the tenets of the Catholic church by the aid of a theological microscope of exceedingly magnifying powers."

A gentleman asked a lawyer how he could punish his servant who had stolen a canister of valuable snuff. "I am not aware of any act," replied the lawyer, "that makes it penal to take snuff."

The Fourcrites of Northampton, Mass. The correspondent of the Salem Locomotive writing from Northampton, alludes as follows to the community of Fourcrites established at that place:—

"About two miles out of town is a community of Socialists, or a community founded on the plan of Fourier. They own a place of about 200 acres, which they cultivate, and also carry on the silk business. The company is divided into shares of $100 each; any one can join by purchasing a share, and subscribing to their rules. Each one is required to labor four hours, per day for the benefit of the concern. They recognize no laws out their own, all religion and ministers are denounced as heretical, and the marriage ceremony is performed without the aid of a minister, witness, or any other accompanying incident to this ceremony in other communities."

Counterfeits.—The counterfeit one dollar notes of the bank of Louisville, are thus described by the Journal: The one noticed, bears date "April 1st 1813," and is signed John S. Sneed, President. The genuine small notes of the bank of Louisville are not signed by the President at all, but only by Mr. Thurston, the cashier. At the date of the counterfeit we have mentioned, Mr. Sneed has long been dead.

A Blow up.—A man in New Haven, Conn. lately attempted to dry several pounds of wet powder, by placing it in a tin oven. The consequence was, that the powder went off, taking with it the oven and its owner, who was standing patiently by. Though severely injured, he is likely to recover. The Lunatic Asylum Journal thinks, that the man should first have put his own head into the oven, and have given that a thorough baking.

A printing office, of course, public property. If a man wants a paper, of course he has a right to it, and a half a sheet of letter paper to wrap it, and writes to seal it and the right to take his editor's pen out of his hand to direct it with. What is the use of having printing offices, unless people can be accommodated at them without money and without price?—Bangor Whig.

Distress in Canada.—We learn that great distress exists among the habitants in the Parish of St. Timothy, in the vicinity of the Beauharnois Canal. It is mentioned that they had neglected putting crops in as usual, in anticipation of making more money by working as laborers on the canal; and that even if they had had the desire to continue at their farming operations, they would have been quite unable to profit by them in consequence of the frequent trespass of the men and horses employed by the contractors. If the distress of the people referred to arises from the conduct of the workmen, it is much to be regretted that it was not prevented in time. But it rises from their abandoning their proper labor for employment on a public work, he fault is entirely their own! But in either case we hope some means will be taken to alleviate suffering. Montreal Herald, Sept. 23.

Falling of in Emigration.—Last year 12,322 steerage passengers arrived in Quebec. This year 18,809 arrived, showing a decrease of 23,013. This is a remarkable falling off in one year.

There were lately 91 arrivals of vessels at the port of Boston in one day.

It is said that the whole military force now in Ireland amounts to 35,000 men.

Two great conflagrations lately occurred at Manila, East Indies—one destroying 600 and the other 1000 houses.

The N. Y. Tribune says that New England was never more active and substantially prosperous than now. All her manufactures are working full time, and realizing quick sales and good returns.

Accident on the Auburn and Rochester Railroad.—We regret to learn that Mr. Blossom, one of the collectors on the Auburn and Rochester railroad, slipped from the cars while on his rounds on Wednesday night, and one of his legs was run over, and so much injured as to require amputation. Mr. B. is a son of Col. Blossom, of Canadaigua.

[For the Neighbor.]

Ma. Editor:— Please favor me with your columns, to reply to another editor's piece published in the last "Warsaw Messenger." He refused to publish my reply to his former remarks against me for want of room in his paper. We excuse him, as his paper has taken such a decent as its present size is, and we would not be surprised if it dwindled down to more shame and disgrace, until it is entirely extinct, like the paper published by the same man did at Carthage a few years ago. A man that cares not who he insults, cannot fill his station long and be supported by a patriotic people, especially if his true principles are known. It is stated to me by respectable gentlemen that he is an abolitionist, a nigger, a state-right man, and we all know he is a pretended Whig.

Mr. Gregg says he wishes no quarrel with the reverend gentleman. We have no personal feelings to gratify. Then we say, why commence on me without an insult from me. If I have disgraced myself by my acts or pen, the public can see it without his falsehoods to illuminate them. I am glad that I am personally known to many respectable citizens in the country who know his statements and foolish article found in his paper signed "A Rip" to be as base as a scoundrel could make them through such a channel. Mr. Gregg continues the (Harper) has placed himself in a most ridiculous attitude before his fellow citizens. How! By telling the truth! If truth will make a man ridiculous I am willing to be considered. But never will I shrink from truth for fear of such men. And if telling the truth will slander a large portion of respectable citizens, I am guilty. But if truth which is known to be truth cannot slander any one, then I am not guilty.

I will here say that I hope that there are many good Whigs that have not been guilty of the mob spirit, which I esteem as gentlemen. But if Mr. Gregg is prophetic enough to know my motive in opposing the mob spirit among some designing demagogues, who have been charged because they did not get an office, he must have received his knowledge from some source as he does not believe that God has any prophets now a days, and we learn that "satan is the father of lies" and of course his prediction about votes are false. If I am such an "ignoramus" as his paper says I am, I could not have such designs. But let it be known to all men that office is not my motive, but truth and the well being of my country. All I have is here, and I consider it my right to protect my all in every way that is right.

Yours Respectfully,
JOHN HARPER.

[For the Nauvoo Neighbor.]

Mr. Editor:— Sir: I perceive by the Warsaw Stop that the creature is still at his dirty work; that instead of meeting me as an honest man and making good his charges, he sticks off like a thief caught in the very act, and that his retreat may appear more plausible, he issues forth a string of Billingsgate slang and potshoy wit; but this is just as I expected. In my letter I stated facts and showed the reason why this thing was taking the course it was, not that Tommy cared much about politics, but he knew something must be done or the Stop-pail would soon be no more. Little Tommy, however, does give some reason why he evades me—because I am too fresh from her Britannic Majesty's Isle to comprehend republican principles! Now, Tommy, you have got me in a corner! Lucky thought for the little thing! Now he can leave his libelous charges with a good grace. Tommy never knew that there was a possibility of learning something of the laws, government and customs of other countries besides the one we live in. However, he is excusable, as I hinted in my former communication, Tommy picked his education up! According to his logic he that lives the longest in any country knows the most. We need no be at much trouble to disprove this, for little Tommy himself settles that point for he does not know good manners much less can he comprehend republican principles or any other good principle. Tommy shines in slander and botching the characters of good men, endeavoring to bring them down to a level with himself.

A word with Tommy before I close:— Seeing that you cannot substantiate any of the charges, and you fairly give it up, my advice to you is to take care you never get into jeopardy again, or perhaps you may find more difficulty next time in getting extricated. Your business, at the best, is not very honorable—spreading falsehoods, through the country, you might have expected that your sins would find you out. It is true your object was to bring yourself into notice, you being of the dwarf species every one overlooked you; but, my little fellow, you began barking up the wrong tree; do you not know that great heights are hazardous to weak heads like yours. Do you not remember the tale of Hampty Dumpty, when he mounted the wall?

Mr. Editor—Trusting that this little creature may profit by my advice I now leave him, and as he said something about understrappers I think I have strangled him in such a way that we shall have no more of Tommy's falsehoods.

Yours, &c.,
JOHN GREENHOW.

The Boston Post says a man ought to be ashamed of himself to run away with another man's wife, when there are so many maiden ladies with their trunks all packed ready for a start!

A correspondent of the Christian Herold speaks of a Come-outer priest in Maine, who is endeavoring to put down preaching, and holds meetings on Sabbath to put down, and receives pay while opposing a hiring of a priest! Yet these inconsistencies are all swallowed by some people in the 19th century.

The whig papers in the congressional district of Illinois immediately opposite are loud in their denunciations of the Mormons, and call Mr. Hoge the Mormon member. Before the election, when their votes were considered necessary to secure the election of Mr. Walker, the Mormons were thought to be clever enough people; but having failed to use them, they now resort to abuse. Mr. Walker would even now most willingly accept the soubriquet of "the Mormon member" for the Mormon votes.—I. T. Gaz. and Adv.

THE MORMONS.

Although much complaint has been made about the Mormons, we saw on our late trip evidences of improvement on our prairies, which we consider highly creditable to the Mormons who made them, and without whom we doubt whether they would have been made for many years to come. All those who have travelled over the large prairie between Fort Madison, Warsaw, and Carthage, remember how dreary it was a few years since. Now it is studded with houses and good farms.—The English, who understand hedging and ditching far better than our people, have gone upon that prairie and have enclosed extensive fields in this manner.—Along the old Rock Island Trace, which we travelled seven years ago and which was then a dreary waste, we saw a field, enclosed with a good old fence, six miles long and one wide. We think such enterprise is worthy to be mentioned. As long as the Mormons are harmless and do not interfere with the rights of our people, we think they should be treated well. We shall never convince them that they are a deluded people, as far as their religious notions are concerned, in any other way.—Hawley-Eye.

The first Snow Storm.—We learn by a gentleman who came down on the New Brazil, that they had a violent Snow Storm at Fort Atkinson on last Saturday, the 14th instant, which covered the ground to the depth of about six inches. The decks of the Brazil were of course covered with snow before she left Prairie du Chien, which made it very uncomfortable for the passengers and crew. On the same day the snow was four inches deep at Galena. There was also some snow at the Sac and Fox Agency at the same time.—Hawley-Eye.

Steam Frigate Missouri Burnt.—The American Steam Frigate Missouri, which cost an immense sum of money, caught fire in Gibraltar Bay and was utterly consumed. Every exertion was made to save her by the British authorities and by the man-of-war-men, but all to no avail. She took fire at 8 p.m. and blew up at twenty minutes past three the next morning.—Captain Newton was the last to leave the ship. Hon. C. Cushing, our Minister to China was on board. He saved his most valuable papers.

A last word on Wheat.—Let no one therefore assert that the wheat crop is uncertain. There are soils and latitudes better adapted to its cultivation than others, as in the case of all other crops, but it is really as certain a crop as any other. Why should it not be, since its cultivation dates back to the commencement of man's history? In England there is no uncertainty in the wheat crop, except what is occasioned by the vicissitudes of the seasons, and so it is in this country with those that pursue the English mode of cultivating it. Why did Win. C. Williams, in this neighborhood, reap thirteen bushels to the acre this year, while the wheat of the majority of Kentucky cultivators was not worth reaping at all? He sowed early at the rate of three bushels of seed to the acre, upon a rich clover lea, ploughed eight to ten inches deep water furrows. They sowed late, a bushel an acre, upon worn-out land and scratched the surface with the plough, so that much of the seed did not come up, much that came up was winter-killed, and what remained in the spring was smothered by grass and weeds. Since the laws of nature are invariable—since like effects are certain to follow like causes, who can doubt that Mr. Williams will always have a good wheat crop, or that his careless fellow-citizens will always have bad ones, while both pursue their respective methods? If Mr. Williams produced on 20 acres 600 bushels of wheat, he would upon 100 of the same sort of land, with the same sort of treatment, have produced inevitably, 3000 bushels, and if he produced thirty bushels of wheat an acre this year, will he not, under like circumstances, gather a similar harvest next year, and the next, and the next?

Let not the farmer neglect to soak his seed in strong brine and then roll it in lime.—This is always done in England. Many believe it will prevent rust, although it seems to have failed in some instances in this region. At all events the washing will get out the bad wheat, and make the seed sprout and grow off more rapidly, and the salt and lime will act as manures.—Low Jour.

Murder of a Revolutionary Soldier.—The Knoxville, Tenn. Register gives the particulars of the barbarous murder of Mr. John Sutton, of Meigs Co. a soldier of the Revolution. He had visited Knoxville to obtain his pension money, it being his custom to perform that trip every six months, and having received from the Pension Agent the amount to which he was entitled, he left town on horseback at about one or two o'clock in the day, on his way home.

About 4 o'clock he was found six miles from Knoxville, bruised and mangled in a horrid manner, and almost lifeless. All efforts to resuscitate him proved unavailing, and he died about midnight, without being able to articulate distinctly or give any clue whereby the depraved wretch who murdered him might be detected.—He was about 95 years old, and is said to have been unusually active and sprightly at that advanced age.

This black crime was committed for the paltry sum of thirty three dollars.

REVIEW OF THE SAINT LOUIS MARKETS.

REPUBLICAN OFFICE, St. Louis, Oct. 4, 1843.
Remarks.—Business has very perceptibly improved within a few days past, and I on the favorable state of the weather and the advance of the season, we may reasonably expect that the fall trade has fairly commenced, and will continue to improve hereafter. Wholesale dealers on Main street have been doing a fair business, and anticipate an active and full season.

Produce, with the exception of wheat, tobacco and bacon, has come forward very slowly, and a very good demand exists for nearly every article that is offered.

Flour.—This market is languid and unsteady, but there has been more doing in this article this week than the last, but operations have been upon a small scale, and at a reduced price. We place our figures to day for country brands at $3.00 a 37 1/2, and 1 c only sale of an amount was one lot of 100 bbls., and two of 70, and 80 bbls each at $2.50. Several smaller lots were sold on the levee at $2.62 1/2 a 2 7/8. The demand is very limited and a considerable portion of the receipts has been forwarded, in City Mills' Flour no sales are made but on retail.

Wheat.—This article still comes forward very freely. The receipts amounting to 10,783 bushels this week; but on the 4th and 5th it has gone off briskly at our last week's figures; and on the 6th the market is rather heavy, a fair trade has been sold at 45 1/2, which is the highest it has sold for this week. Good and prime lots were therefore quoted at 46 1/2 inferior and fair at 50 a 55; observing that the market has a downward tendency, and if receipts continue full, the price will recede.

Corn.—Several considerable lots have been received this week, most of which was sent forward by first hands—29 cents was offered for a lot of 1000 sacks, sack included, to-day, and a reduced; and one or two lots were sold at 25 cents without sack. The article is in good demand at our figures, say 25c, without sack; 25c sack included.

Oats.—This article is in brisk demand, and a lot that is received finds ready sale at 20 cents without sack.

Hemp.—We see no reason from the state of the market to change our figures of last week, which were for a good article in order, $2.80 a $3; for inferior, $2.75 a 2 87 1/2—which will embrace nearly all the sales of the week. One lot however, of about 30 tons changed hands, we are informed, at $3.25 and yesterday a lot of 83 bbls was sold at $3, and several small lots have been sold at prices within our range. The demand for most articles, both for shipments and to supply the city factories.

Pork.—Very little indeed doing in this article, the receipts are so small as to merit no attention; although what is offered is readily taken at 4 1/2 cents, if a prime article. We place our figures at the extremes, 3 1/2 to 4 1/2, according to quality.

Lard.—The market is flat, with a heavy stock in the stores, and very liberal receipts. Sales can be effected but at low prices, which we quote, and which we believe, is the highest that can be obtained for ordinary country cured lard. Say 1 c clear sides 2 1/2; shoulders 1 1/2, and hams 3 1/2 cents. Superior lots put up for family use will command a better price for the city retail trade.

DEATHS.—For the week ending Monday the 23d inst.

THE UNEXPECTED FRIEND.

A BEAUTIFUL TALE.

It must be, my child! said the poor widow, wiping away the tears which slowly trickled down her wasted cheeks. There is no other resource. I am too sick to work, and you surely cannot see me and your little brother starve. Try and beg a few shillings, and perhaps by the time that is gone, I may be better. Go, Henry, my dear—I grieve to send you on such an errand, but it must be done.

The boy, a noble looking little fellow of about ten years, started up, and throwing his arms around his mother's neck, left the house without a word. He did not hear the groan of anguish that was uttered by his parent as the door closed behind him; and it was well that he did not, for his little heart was ready to burst without it. It was a by-street in Philadelphia, and as he walked to and fro on the side walk, he looked first at one street and then at another, as they passed him, but no one seemed to look kindly on him, and the longer he waited, the faster his courage dwindled away, and the more difficult it became to master resolution to beg. The tears were running fast down his cheeks, but nobody noticed them, or if they did, nobody seemed to care for although clean, Henry looked poor and miserable, and it is common for the poor and miserable to cry!

Every body seemed in a hurry, and the poor boy was quite in despair, when at last he espied a gentleman very leisurely taking a morning walk. He was dressed in black, wore a three-cornered hat, and had a face that was as mild and benignant as an angel's. Somehow, when Henry looked at him he felt all his fears vanish at once, and instantly approached him. His tears had been flowing so long that his eyes were quite red and swollen, and his voice trembled—but that was with weakness, for he had not eaten for twenty-four hours. As Henry, with a low, faltering voice, begged for a little charity, the gentleman stopped, and his kind heart melted with compassion as he looked into the fair countenance of the poor boy, and saw the deep blush which spread all over his face, and listened to the modest, humble tones which accompanied his petition.

You do not look like a boy that has been accustomed to beg his bread, said he, kindly laying his hand on the boy's shoulder, what has driven you to this step?

Indeed, answered Henry, his tears beginning to flow afresh, indeed, I was not born in this condition. But the misfortunes of my father, and the sickness of my mother, have driven me to the necessity now.

Who is your father, inquired the gentleman, still more interested.

My father was a rich merchant of this city; but he became benighted for a friend, who soon after failed, and he was entirely ruined. He could not live long after this loss, and in one month he died of grief, and his death was more dreadful than any other trouble. My mother, my little brother, and myself, soon sunk into the lowest depths of poverty. My mother has, until now, managed to support herself and my little brother by her labor, and I have earned what I could by shovelling snow and other work that I could find to do. But, night before last, mother was taken very sick, and she has since become so much worse that—here the tears poured faster than ever—I do fear she will die. I cannot think of any way in the world to help her. I have not had any work for several weeks. I have not had the courage to go to any of my mother's old acquaintances, to tell them that she has come to need charity. I thought you looked like a stranger, sir, and something in your face overcame my shame and gave me courage to speak to you.—O, sir, do pity my poor mother!

The tears, and the simple and moving language of the poor boy, touched a chord in the bosom of the stranger that was accustomed to frequent vibrations. Where does your mother live, my boy? said he in a husky voice, is it far from here?

She lives in the last house in this street, sir, replied Henry. You can see it from here, in the third block, on the left hand side.

Have you sent for a physician?

No, sir, said the boy sorrowfully, shaking his head. I had no money to pay either for a physician or for a medicine.

Here, said the stranger, drawing some pieces of silver from his pocket, here are three dollars, take them and run immediately for a physician.

Henry's eyes flashed with gratitude—he received the money with a stammering and almost inaudible voice, but with a look of the warmest gratitude, and vanished.

The benevolent stranger immediately sought the dwelling of the sick widow. He entered a little room in which he could see nothing but a few fragments of female labor—a miserable table, an old bureau, and a little bed which stood in one corner, on which the invalid lay. She appeared weak and almost exhausted; and on the bed at her feet sat a little boy, crying as if his heart would break.

Deeply moved at this sight, the stranger drew near the bedside of the invalid, and feeling to be a physician, inquired into the nature of her disease. The symptoms were explained in a few words, when the widow, with a deep sigh, added, O, sir, my sickness has a deeper cause, and one which is beyond the art of the physician to cure. I am a mother—a wretched mother. I see my children, sinking daily deeper and deeper in want, which I have no means of relieving. My sickness is of the heart, and death alone can end my sorrows; but even death is dreadful to me, for it awakens the thought of the misery into which my children would be plunged if—Here emotion ed unrestrained down her cheeks. But the pretended physician spoke so consolingly to her, and manifested so warm a sympathy for her condition, that the heart of the poor woman throbbed with a pleasure that was unthought of.

Do not despair, said the benevolent stranger, think only of recovery and of preserving a life that is so precious to your children. Can I write a prescription here?

The poor woman took a little prayer book from the hands of the child who sat with her on the bed, and tearing out a blank leaf, I have no other paper, said she, but perhaps this will do.

The stranger took a pencil from his pocket, and wrote a few lines upon the paper.

This prescription, said he, you will find of great service to you. If it is necessary, I will write you a second. I have great hopes of your recovery.

He laid the paper on the table and went away.

Scarcely was he gone when the elder son returned.

Cheer up, dear mother, said he, going to her bedside and affectionately kissing her. See what a kind, benevolent stranger has given us. It will make us rich for several days. It has enabled us to have a physician, and he will be here in a moment. Compose yourself now, dear mother, and take courage.

Come nearer, my son, answered the mother, looking with pride and affection on her child. Come nearer, that I may bless you. God never forsakes the innocent and good. O may he still watch over you in all your paths! A physician has just been here. He was a stranger, but he spoke to me with a kindness and a compassion that were a balm to my heart. When he went away, he left that prescription on the table; see if you can read it.

Henry glanced at the paper and started back—he took it up, and as he read it through again and again, a cry of wonder and astonishment escaped him.

What is it, my son? exclaimed the poor widow, trembling with an apprehension of she knew not what.

Ah, read, dear mother! God has heard us.

The mother took the paper from the hand of her son, but no sooner had she fixed her eyes upon it, than my God! she exclaimed, it is Washington! and fell back fainting upon her pillow.

The writing was an obligation from Washington, (for it was indeed he) by which the widow was to receive the sum of one hundred dollars, from his own private property to be doubled in case of necessity.

Meanwhile the expected physician made his appearance and soon awoke the mother from her fainting fit. The joyful surprise, together with a good nurse with which the physician provided her, and a plenty of wholesome food soon restored her to perfect health.

The influence of Washington, who visited them more than once, provided for the widow friends who furnished her with constant and profitable employment, and her sons when they had arrived at the proper age, they placed in respectable situations, where they were able to support themselves, and render the remainder of their mother's life comfortable and happy.

Let the children who read this story remember, when they think of the great and good Washington, that he was not above entering the dwelling of poverty, and carrying joy and gladness to the hearts of his inmates. This is no fictitious tale, but is only one of a thousand incidents which might be related of him, and which stamp him one of the best men.—Christian Messenger.

Napoleon and the Doctors.—Although Napoleon entertained a high opinion of surgeons, his notions in regard to physicians were not the most exalted. He once said to Barry O'Meara, at St. Helena, "You medical men will have more to answer for than we generals."

You kill as many as we do; and when the physician has despatched a number of human beings, either through ignorance or mistake, he is just as cool and unconcerned about it as a General with whom I was acquainted, who, having lost 3,000 men in storming a hill, and having succeeded after many desperate attempts, observed, with great sang-froid, "Oh, it was not this hill I wanted to take—it was another; this is of no utility!" and coolly returned to his former position.

Paying Dear.—A leading member of the French Chamber of Deputies, asserted in a late debate that the death of each Arab in the war at Algiers, had cost France thirty-three men and one hundred and fifty thousand francs, equal to our war in Florida.

FASHIONABLE TAILORING.

M. ROBERT WELLS, respectfully informs the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity, that he has commenced the above business at the corner of Main and Parley streets, and hopes by strict attention thereto, and moderate charges, to merit a share of public patronage.

FALL & WINTER READY MADE CLOTHING.

M. BROWN, at 52 Main street, St. Louis, has already received several shipments, and will continue to receive weekly fresh supplies of superior ready-made clothing, the goods of which were bought at auction, for cash, previously to the late advance on goods, and made up under his immediate direction by a wholesale clothing house in the city of New York, with which he is connected. His stock will be large, comprising every article kept in a clothing or furnishing store.

Having one of the best cutters in the United States to superintend that department, he is confident his garments will compare successfully with any in this city, in fashion, beauty, make or fit.

Persons visiting St. Louis for the purpose of replenishing their wardrobes, either in clothing or furnishing articles, will do well to call on the subscriber, where they will not only find the most fashionable and best made garments, but at prices decidedly lower than any other house in the city of St. Louis.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

CAMPBELL LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, Insomnia and nervous affections generally. Persons recovering or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really refreshing, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER. This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents,) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by (22-y1.) J. SNIDER, Sole Agent for the City of Nauvoo.

A POEM.

BY MONTGOMERY.

From the "Forget-Me-Not," for 1843.
THE PRESS.

THE PRESS! what is the Press? I cried;
And thus a wondrous voice replied—

In me all human knowledge dwells;
The oracle of bibles,
Past, present, future, I reveal,
Or in oblivion's silence seal;
What I preserve can perish never—
What I forego is lost forever.

Ispeak all languages; by me
The deaf may hear, the blind may see,
The dumb converse, the dead of old Communion with the living hold.
All lands are one beneath my rule;
All nations learners in my school;
Men of all ages every where Become contemporaries there.

What is the Press? 'Tis what the tongue
Was to the world when Time was young;
When by tradition, size to son,
Convey'd what'er was known or done;
Fact and fiction were mix'd,
Their boundaries never could be fix'd.

What is the Press? 'Tis that which taught
By hieroglyphic forms of thought,
Lore from the vulgar proudly hid,
Like treasures in a pyramid;
For knowledge then was mystery,
A captive under lock and key—
By priests and princes held in thrall,
Of little use or none at all.

'Till the two-edged ALPHABET
Free their own great deliverers set,
At whose command, by simple spells,
They work their mental miracles.

What is the Press? 'Tis what the Pen
Was thenceforth to centuries to men—
When all believes lent wings to words,
Or edged in hooks, they sang like birds.
But slow the pen, and frail the page—
To write twice folios, ask'd an age;
And a pebble at night might spill
The fruits of twenty authors' toil.

A power was wanting to ensure Life to works worthy to endure;
A power to trace to multiply
Of intellectual potency;
It came, all handicaps to redress;
And truth and virtue healed the Press.

What am I then? I am a power,
Years cannot waste, nor flames devour,
Nor waters drown, nor tyrants bind—
I am the mirror of man's mind,
In whose serene impassive face,
What cannot die on earth, you trace—
Not phantom shapes that come and fly,
But like the concave of the sky,
In which the stars, by night and day,
Seen, or unseen, hold on their way.

Then think we not the lifeless frame,
Which bears my honorable name;
Nor dwell I in the room, where swing
Intelligence from blocks can bring;
Nor in the hand, whose fingers fine,
The common characters combine—
Not even the cogitative brain,
Whose cells, the germs of thought contain,
Which that quick hand in letters sows,
Like dabbled wheat, in funeral rows;
And that strong arm, like autumn sheaves,
Reaps and binds up in gathered leaves,
The harvest home of learned toil
From that dead frame's well-cultured soil.
I am not one, nor all of these;

They are my types and images—
The instruments with which I work;
In them no secret virtues lurk.
I am an omnipresent soul;
I live and move throughout the whole,
And thence, with freedom unconfined,
And universal as the wind—
Whose sources and issues are unknown,
Felt in its airy flight alone—
All life supplying with its breath,
And, when 'tis gone, involving death.
I quicken souls from Nature's sloth—
Fashion their forms, sustain their growth—
And when my influence fails or flies,
Matter may live, but spirit dies.

Myself withdrawn from mortal sight,
I am invisible as light—
I light which revealing all beside,
I dwell within itself can hide—
The things of darkness I make bare,
And nowhere seen, am everywhere.
All that Philosophers have sought—
Science discover'd genius wrought;
All that reflective memory stores,
Or rich imagination pours;
All that the wit of man conceives;
All that he wishes, hopes, believes;
All that he loves, or fears, or hates;

All that to earth or heaven relates—
These are the lessons that I teach,
By speaking silence, silent speech.

Ah! who like me can bless or curse?
What can be better, what be worse,
Than language framed for Paradise
Or sold to infamy or vice?
Blest be the man by whom I bless—Accursed he who wrongs the Press;
The scribe in prose or song,
Who wields the power of right for wrong—
Wrong, to outlast, has laurel'd tomb,
And haunts the earth till time of doom.

INDIAN ANECDOTES.

Sam Hide.—There are few, we imagine, who have not heard of this personage; but, notwithstanding his great notoriety, we might not be thought serious in the rest of our work, were we to enter seriously into his biography; for the reason, that from his day to this, his name has been a by-word in all New England, and means as much as to say the greatest of liars. It is on account of the following anecdote that he is noticed:

Sam Hide was a notorious cider drinker as well as liar, and used to travel the country to and fro begging it from door to door. At one time he happened in a region of country where cider was very hard to be procured, either from its scarcity, or from Sam's frequent visits. However, cider he was determined to have, if lying, in any shape or color, would gain it. Being not far from the house of an acquaintance, who he knew had cider but he knew, or was well satisfied, that in the ordinary way of begging, he could not get it; he set his wits at work to lay a plan to insure it. This did not occupy him long. On arriving at the house of the gentleman, instead of asking for cider, he inquired for the man of the house, whom, on appearing, Sam requested to go aside with him, as he had something of importance to communicate to him. When they were by themselves, Sam told him he had that morning shot a fine deer, and that, if he would give him a crown, he would tell him where it was. The gentleman did not incline to do this, but offered half a crown. Finally, Sam said as he had walked a great distance that morning, and was very dry, for a half a crown and a mug of cider he would tell him. This was agreed upon, and the price paid. Now Sam was required to point out the spot where the deer was to be found, which he did in this manner:—He said to his friend, You know of such a meadow, describing it—Yes—You know a big ash tree, with a big top by the little brook—Yes—Well, under that tree it is the deer. This was satisfactory, and Sam departed. It is unnecessary to mention that the meadow was found, and the tree by the brook, but no deer. The duped man could hardly contain himself on considering what he had been doing. To look after Sam for satisfaction would be worse than looking after the deer, so the farmer concluded to go home contented. Some years after, he happened to fall in with the Indian, and he immediately began to rally him for deceiving him so, and demanded back his money and pay for his cider and trouble. Why, said Sam, would you find fault if I had told truth half the time?—No—Well, says Sam, you find him meadow?—Yes—You find him tree?—Yes—What for then you find fault Sam Hide, when he told you two truths to one lie? The affair ended here. Sam heard no more from the farmer.

This is but one of the numerous anecdotes of Sam Hide, which, could they be collected, would fill many pages. He died in Dedham, 5 January, 1732, at the great age of 105 years. He was a great jester, and passed for an uncommon wit. In all the wars against the Indians during his lifetime, he served the English faithfully, and had the name of a brave soldier. He had himself killed 10 of the enemy, and tried hard to make up the 20th, but was unable.

Characters contrasted.—An Indian of the Kennebec tribe, remarkable for his good conduct, received a grant of land from the state, and fixed himself in a new township where a number of families were settled. Though not ill treated, yet the common prejudice against Indians prevented any sympathy with him. This was shown at the death of his only child, when none of the people came near him. Shortly after he went to some of the inhabitants and said to them, When white man's child die, Indian man be sorry—he help bury him.—When my child die no one speak to me—I make his grave alone. I can no live here. He gave up his farm, dug up his body of his child, and carried it with him 200 miles through the forests, to join the Canada Indians.

A singular Stratagem to escape Torture.—Some years ago the Shawano Indians, being obliged to remove from their habitations, in their way took a Muskogee warrior, known by the name of old Scrapy, prisoner; they bastinadoed him severely, and condemned him to the fiery torture. He underwent a great deal without showing any concern; his countenance and behavior were as if he suffered not the less pain. He told his persecutors with a bold voice, that he was a warrior; and he had gained most of his martial reputation at the expense of their nation, and was desirous of showing them, in the act of dying, that he was still as much their superior, as when he headed his gallant countrymen; that although he had fallen in their hands, and forfeited the protection of the divine power by some impurity or other, when carrying the holy ark of war against his devoted enemies, yet he had so much remaining virtue as would enable him to punish himself more exquisitely than all their despicable, ignorant crowd possibly could; and that he would do so, if they gave him liberty by untying him, and handing him one of the red-hot gun-barrels out of the fire. The proposal, and his method of address, appeared so exceedingly bold and uncommon, that his request was granted. Then suddenly seizing one end of the red-hot barrel, and brandishing it from side to side, leaped down a prodigious steep and high bank into a branch of the river, dived through it, ran over a small island, and passed the other branch, amidst a shower of bullets; and though numbers of his enemies were in close pursuit of him, he got into a brambly swamp, through which, though naked and in a mangled condition, he reached his own country.

Ignorance the Offspring of absurd Opinions.—The resolution and courage of the Indians, says Colonel Rogers, "under sickness and pain, is truly surprising. A young woman will be in labor a whole day without uttering one groan or cry; should she betray such a weakness, they would immediately say, that she was unworthy to be a mother, and that her offspring could not be of being towards." A Northern Custom.—When Mr. Herne was on the Coppermine River, in 1771, some of the Copper Indians in his company killed a number of Esquimaux, by which act they considered themselves unclean; and all concerned in the murder were not allowed to cook any provisions, either for themselves or others. They were, however, allowed to eat of other cooking, but not until they had painted, with a kind of red earth, all the space between their nose and chin, as well as a greater part of their cheeks, almost to their ears. Neither would they use any other dish or pipe, than their own.

Another Poet's Tale.—While Lewis and Clark were on the shore of the Pacific Ocean in 1805, one of their men went one evening into a village of the Klamuk Indians, alone, a small distance from his party, and on the opposite side of a creek from that of the encampment. A strange Indian happened to be there also, who expressed great respect and awe for the white man; but in reality he meant to murder him for the articles he had about him. This happened to come to the knowledge of a Chinook woman, and she determined at once to save his life; therefore, when the white man was about to return to his companions, the Indian was going to accompany him, and kill him in the way. As they were about to set out, the woman caught the white man by the clothes, to prevent his going with the Indian. He, not understanding her intention, pulled away from her; but as a last resort, she ran out and shrieked, which raised the men in every direction; and the Indian became alarmed for his own safety, and made his escape before the white man knew he was in danger.

Self-consumption in Time of Danger.—There was in Carolina a noted chief of the Yamosees, who, in the year 1702, with about 600 of his countrymen, went against the Spaniards in Florida. His name was Arratimuhaw. When the English were obliged to abandon their undertaking, and as they were retreating to their boats, they became alarmed, supposing the Spaniards were upon them. Arratimuhaw, having arrived at the boats, was repelling himself upon his arms, and was fast asleep. The soldiers called him for being so slow in his retreat, and ordered him to make more haste; but he replied, "No—though your Governor leaves you, I will not stir till I have seen all my men before me."

Indifference.—Archibald was a sachem of Maryland, whose residence was upon the Potomack, when that country was settled by the English in 1633. The place of his residence was named, like the river, Potomack. As usual with the Indians, he received the English under Governor Calvert with great attention. It should be noted, that Archibald was not head sachem of the Potomacks, but governor instead of his nephew, who was a child, and who, like the head men of Virginia, was called recogevance. From this place the colonists sailed 20 leagues further up the river, to a place called Piscataway. Here a war canoe went on board the governor's pinnace, to treat with him. On being asked whether he was willing the English should settle in his country, in case they found a place convenient for them, he made answer, I will not bid you go, neither will I bid you stay, but you may use your own discretion.

Curiosity.—When any of the Indians come into our towns, our people are apt to crowd round them, gaze upon them, and incommode them where they desire to be private; this they esteem great rudeness, and the effect of the want of instruction in the rules of civility and good manners. "We have," say they, "as much curiosity as you, and when you come into our towns, we wish for opportunities of looking at you; but for this purpose we hide ourselves behind bushes where you are to pass, and never intrude ourselves into your company."

FUNERAL EXPENSES AND SALARY OF GENERAL HARRISON.

Congress made appropriations to defray the funeral expenses of Gen. Harrison, and they ordered a year's salary to be paid to his aged widow, deducting so much of it as had been paid to the General in his life time, with great unanimity. The great body of the people were perfectly satisfied with these appropriations, except that many thought the sum allowed to the widow too small. Yet there are found even to this day, vile demagogues, who denounce these appropriations, as unprecedented and improper, and as evidence of Whig corruption and extravagance!

The editor of the Byrns Atlas, in reference to this subject, has called the public attention to the following precedents, to which we invite the reader's attention:

As to the Funeral Expenses.
George Washington died in 1799, when a private citizen, and long after the close of his Presidential term. On the 31 of May, 1800, Congress appropriated $3000 to defray his funeral expenses, and directed a monument to be erected to his memory.

Elbridge Gerry and George Clinton both died at Washington, & Congress made appropriations to defray their funeral expenses, and for monuments.

The funeral expenses of every member of Congress that dies at Washington, are defrayed by the public, by Congressional appropriations.

Stephen Haight, Sergeant-at-arms of the Senate, died at Washington, and Congress appropriated money to pay his funeral expenses.

William T. Barry was sent by Gen. Jackson minister to Spain in 1835. Mr. Barry died at Liverpool on his way to Spain. The Government paid $9000 for his outfit, his salary up to the time of his death, and $2250 to defray the expenses of his family back to the U. States, making an aggregate of $24,250.

We make no comments upon these facts.—An intelligent and right minded people, despise the demagogues who would seek to make political capital out of such appropriation.—Cin. Gaz.

Riot at Wilmington.—The Delaware State Journal says:—A disturbance rather unusual for our peaceful city, took place on Wednesday night last, which was accompanied by some loss of property. A load of flour barrels was brought in from the country in the evening, and bought and paid for by Messrs Price of Brandywine. They were not, however, stored away in the mill that night, as usual, but left in the wagon at Hopple's Tavern. About 12 o'clock at night a number of persons took possession of the wagon, and proceeded very summarily to dispose of its contents. The barrels were taken out one by one, to the number of 150, and broken to pieces the staves, heads and hoops being piled in the middle of Shipley street, where they were still visible yesterday morning. When the rioters had finished their work, they gave three cheers and departed, without doing any further injury. We have not heard that any of the persons concerned in this affair were recognized, or that any one has been arrested. Suspicion, of course, is fixed upon the cooper, but who are the men?

Mis-apprehension.—We remember being once at a Conference meeting in Laurens land, says a southern editor, when one of the Deacons came reading asking the people if they wanted salvation. Near us sat a butcher boy, of 19 years, about as amiable as a lamb in his hands would have been to mercy. "Do you want salvation?" said the Deacon, looking up at his brutal face. "No, darn you—I want Sally Skinner, and the Sexton won't let me take her out in the meeting is all over."

HELEN WATERS.

BY JOHN MALCOLM.

The mountains of Hoy, the highest of the Orkney Islands, rise abruptly out of the ocean to an elevation of fifteen hundred feet, and terminate on one side in a cliff, sheer and stupendous as if the mountain had been cut down through the middle, and the severed portion of it buried in the sea. Immediately on the landward side of this precipice lies a soft green valley, embosomed among huge black cliffs, where the sound of the human voice, or the report of a gun, is reverberated among the rocks, where it gradually dies away into faint and fainter echoes.

The hills are intersected by deep and dreary glens, where the hum of the world is never heard, and the only voices of life are the beat of the lamb and the shriek of the eagle;—even the sounds of inanimate nature are of the most doleful kind. The breeze wafts not on its wings the whispers of the woodland; for there are no trees in the island, and the roar of the torrent stream and the sea's eternal moan forever sadden these solitudes of the world.

The ascent of the mountains is in some parts almost perpendicular, and in all exceedingly steep; but the admirer of Nature in her grandest and most striking aspects will be amply compensated for his toil, upon reaching their summits, by the magnificent prospect which they afford. Towards the north and east, the vast expanse of the ocean, and the islands, with their dark heath-clad hills, their green vales, and gigantic cliffs, expand below as far as the eye can reach. The view towards the south is bounded by the lofty mountains of Scarabin and Morven, and by the wild hills Strathnaver and Cape Wrath, stretching towards the west. In the direction of the latter, far away in mid-ocean may be seen, during clear weather, a barren rock called Sale Skerry, which superstition in former days had peopled with marauding monsters of the deep. This solitary spot had been long known to the Orkadians as the haunt of sea-fowl and seals, and was the scene of their frequent shooting excursions, though such periods of idleness have been long since abandoned. It is associated in my mind with a wild tale, which I have heard in my youth, though I am uncertain whether or not the circumstances which it narrates are yet in the memory of living men.

On the opposite side of the mountainous island of which I speak, and divided from it by a frith of several miles in breadth, lie the flat serpentine shores of the principal island, or mainland, where, upon a gentle slope, at a short distance from the sea-beach, may still be traced the site of a cottage, once the dwelling of a humble couple of the name of Waters, belonging to that class of small proprietors which forms a connecting link between the gentry and the peasantry.

Their only child Helen, at the time to which my narration refers, was just budding into womanhood; and though uninitiated into what would now be considered the indispensable requisites of female education, was yet not altogether unaccomplished for the simple times in which she lived; and, though a child of nature, had a grace beyond the reach of art, untaught and unteachable. There was a softness and delicacy in her whole demeanor, never looked for and seldom found in the humble sphere of life to which she belonged. Yet her beauty did not startle or surprise, but stole over the heart almost insensibly, like the gentle fall of the symphony of her own native isles, and like that, produced in the beholder an emotion almost allied to sadness.

Such a being was not likely to be appreciated by the rude and common-place minds by whom she was surrounded, and with whom a rosy cheek and a laughing eye constitute the beau ideal of woman; but she awakened a world of romance in one young heart, with which her own gentle bosom shared the feelings she inspired.

Henry Graham, the lover of Helen Waters, was the son of a small proprietor in the neighborhood; and being of the same humble rank with herself, and though not rich, removed from poverty, their views were unobscured by the dregs of avarice or the fears of want, and the smiles of approving friends seemed to sweeten their approaching union.

The days of courtship were drawing toward a close, and the period of their marriage was at last coalesced upon by the bride. Among the mingling and lower classes of society in the Orkneys, it is customary for the bridegroom to invite the wedding-guests in person; for which purpose, a few days previous to the marriage, young Graham, accompanied by his friend, took a boat and proceeded to the island of Hoy, to request the attendance of a family residing there, which done, on the following day they joined a party of young men upon a shooting excursion to Rackwick, a village romantically situated on the opposite side of the island. They left the house of their friends on a bright calm, autumnal morning, and began to traverse the wild and savage glens which intersect the hills, where their progress might be guessed at by the reports of their guns, which gradually became fainter and fainter among the mountains, and at last died away altogether in the distance.

The night and the following day passed, and they did not return to the house of their friends; but the weather being extremely fine, it was supposed that they had extended their excursion to the opposite coast of Caithness, or to some of the neighbouring islands, so that their absence created no alarm whatever.

The same conjectures also quieted the anxieties of the bride, until the morning previous to that of the marriage, when her alarm could no longer be suppressed. A boat was manned in all haste, and despatched to Hoy in quest of them, but did not return that day nor the succeeding night.

The morning of the wedding day dawned at last, bright and beautiful, but still no intelligence arrived of the bridegroom and his party; and the hope which lingered to the last, that they would still make their appearance in time, had prevented the invitations from being postponed, so that the marriage-party began to assemble about mid day.

While the friends were all in amazement, and the bride in a most pitiable state, a boat was seen crossing from Hoy, and hope once more began to revive; but, upon landing her passengers, they turned out to be the members of the family invited from that island, whose surprise at finding how matters stood was equal to that of the other friends.

Meantime all parties united in their endeavours to cheer the poor bride; for which purpose it was agreed, that the festivities should go on,—an arrangement to which the guests the more willingly consented, from a lingering hope that the absentees would still make their appearance, and partly with a view to divert in some measure the intense and painful attention of the bride from the unwelcome circumstance; while she, on the other hand, from feelings of hospitality, exerted herself, though with a heavy heart, to make her guests as comfortable as possible; and, by the very endeavor to put on so much of the gaiety as to prevent her from sinking altogether.

Meantime the day advanced, the festive fires went on, and the glass began to circulate so freely, that the absence of the principal actor of the scene was so far forgotten, that at length the music struck up, and dancing commenced with all the animation which that exercise inspires among the natives of Scotland.

Things were going on in this way, when towards night, and during one of the pauses of the dance, a loud rap was heard at the door, and a gleam of hope was seen to lighten every face, when there entered, not the bridegroom and his party, but a wandering lunatic named Annie Fae, well known and not a little feared in all that country-side. Her garments were little else than a collection of fantastic and partly-coloured rags, bound close around her waist with a girdle of straw, and her head had no other covering than the dark tangled locks that hung, snake-like, over her wild and weather-beaten face, from which peered forth her small, deep, sunk eyes, gleaming with the baleful light of insanity.

Before the surprise and dismay excited by her sudden and unwelcome appearance had subsided, she addressed the company in the following wild and incoherent manner:—

"Hech, Sirs! but here's a merry meeting in loch!—a fine company, by my faith! plenty of guid meat and drink here, and nae expense spared! Aweel, it's no a lost neither; this braw bridal will mak a braw burial, and the same feast will do for both!—But what's the folk a' glowing at! I see warrant nae ye're excusing Annie Fae for spoiling your sport. But ye ken I maun just say my say, and that being do't, I'll no detain you langer, but jog on upon my journey; only I wad just hint, that, for decency sake, ye sud stop that fine filling and dancing for ye may well be lave that kind of things gae me great pleasure to the dead!"

Having thus delivered herself, she made a low courtesy, and brushed out of the house, leaving the company in that state of painful excitement which, in such circumstances, even the ravings of a poor deranged wanderer could not fail to produce.

In this state we too will leave them for the present, and proceed with the party, who set off on the preceding day in search of the bridegroom and his friends. The latter were traced to Rackwick, but there no intelligence could be gained, except that some days previous, a boat, having on board several sportsmen, had been seen putting off from the shore, and sailing away in the direction of Sale Skerry.

The weather continuing fine, the searching party hired a large boat, and proceeded to that remote and solitary rock, upon which, as they neared it, they could

of the home government, we have yet to learn how that policy will succeed when perfected; and we presume that Sir Charles Metcalfe has instructions to follow in the due steps of his predecessor.

All the difficulties between the English and French in the Canadas are by no means settled. It is scarcely to be supposed that the English portion will give up everything to the French, who do not compose more than one-fourth of the aggregate population of the United Province. Neither is it to be supposed that the machinery of government will move along smoothly with the Clergy Reserve Question and the seat of Government Question unsettled. In our opinion the Clergy Reserve Question is to cause more difficulty than any question that has been brought before the people since the Canadas passed to the Crown of England. To show this more satisfactorily, it is only necessary to give the following statement:

Seeds in Canada are 107,761 belonging to the Church of England; 77,839 to that of Rome; 23,342 to that of Scotland; 65,203 British Wesleyan Methodists; 32,313 Canadian Methodists; 7,141 other Methodists; 18,220 Presbyterians; not in connection with the Church of Scotland; 4,233 Congregationalists or Independents; 10,411 Baptists and Adventists; 4,321 Lutherans; 3,200 Quakers; 1,878 Moravians and Friends; 945 Dutch Reformed Church; 1,105 Jews and 10,470 belong to no denomination heretofore enumerated.

To divide the lands to please these different sects—fifteen in all—is no easy matter, and we, therefore, think that Sir Charles Metcalfe has the most important part yet to perform in the settlement of the Canadian troubles.

We shall now look with much interest for intelligence from Canada, particularly for the Governor General's speech on the opening of Parliament. [N. Y. Herald.]

More particulars of the Connecticut murder.—The New York Herald of Monday has the following particulars of the murder which we have mentioned.

Yesterday noon a revolting murder was committed in Westfield, Mass., in Middlebury, about four miles from Mendon. Mr. D. was one of the most respectable and wealthy farmers in that region, went to church in the morning with all his family except his wife, and did not return until after the evening services were over. When he returned, he found his wife weeping in her bed. She has upon her back in the front of the room, her skull crushed in, her face horribly mutilated, her throat cut and seven stabs in her breast. By her side lay a butcher knife, some keys, and three chairs, which were broken and bloody. Two of them were covered with fragments of her flesh and hair, used in beating her over the head. The walls and floor were covered with blood, evidences of frightful desperation, she in defending herself from the assaults of her savage murderers, and they in their diabolical exertions to overcome this heroic but ill-fated woman.

Our informant, who reached this city last evening, near midnight, says the scene in the room was appalling and frightful. It is supposed they found her alone, and in attempting to rob the house, she resisted them and became exasperated, they committed the dreadful and most brutal murder. She was about 35 years of age.

She is represented as a quiet, mild, but courageous woman of large frame, and just the person to resist an attempt at robbery. She has three children, and was universally esteemed, the whole family being members of the Presbyterian Church. The house was robbed of $75, but when all was over, no further theft had been discovered.

The murder is supposed to have been committed by a couple of foreigners, who have been lurking in that region for some days, and who suddenly disappeared.

A curious piece of gold, of twisted workmanship, said to be worth as old gold, twenty pounds, was lately found by a farm servant in ploughing a field belonging to Mr. H. Lillywhite, of Ripley, Hants, England. It is supposed to be a collar worn by the Romans, of very neat workmanship, and in a good state of preservation, and is now in the possession of the Rev. S. Maddock, vicar of Ripley.

If the territory of the United States was as densely populated as England, it would contain four hundred and fifty millions of souls.

THE SINGING MOUSE.

We give (says the London Globe) the following account, furnished us by a correspondent: "The little creature is the common house mouse, of the muscivorous genus. When I heard him he was in full song; having all the notes of a full grown canary. The imitation in the song was perfect. I feel assured that deception was practiced, for by the aid of a powerful glass, which I purpose to borrow, I could observe the tremulousness of the throat; and I asked the proprietor to leave the room for a moment, which he did, in order that I might convince myself that I was not being made the dupe of a ventriloquist. I then placed my eye close to him, and the effect was still the same. No human being could make his piano passages. One circumstance piques me beyond doubt. Sometimes parties have to wait a considerable time before he will pipe. An instance of this kind happened recently at the Palace where he was took for the little Prince of Wales and the Princesses to hear him. When quite still, his notes are surprising,ly distinct, and have all that peculiarity of the notes of the canary, when he is singing himself to sleep. If I may hazard a conjecture, his pitch is more than an octave above that of the bird he imitates. Its history is somewhat interesting. The wife of the man to whom it belonged occupied the flat of a mean house in Red cross square, Cripplegate, at a tailor's. One night, not being able to sleep for what she conceived the gentle singing of the bird, she removed the cage, but the singing remained, and it both puzzled her and excited her curiosity for the rest of the night. She felt convinced that it came from the waister; and she was right. A trap was set, and two nights afterwards the syren was caught, which is likely to prove a golden egg to this knight of the gossamer.

On Tuesday last, the steamboat Mail of Iowa, with colors flying and drums beating, landed at our wharf some hundred or more Mormons, or Latter Day Saints, one half the number composed of ladies. They remained with us about an hour, during which time they took a stroll through some of the principal streets of our city. Having returned aboard, the boat ascended the river a short distance, and making a graceful turn, came down under a high press of steam, passing the city in elegant style, and bending her course towards Shokoum.

Altogether, it was one of the most interesting displays we have ever had in this place. Those who have been accustomed to regard the Mormons as a poor, miserable, ragged set of beings, were certainly disappointed on the occasion of this visit. As to their religion, knowing nothing about it, we have nothing to say, but as to the characters of the individuals composing the society, if we may judge from the appearance of those who were here on Tuesday, it is certainly far superior to what has generally been supposed. The gentlemen composing the party who visited us, looked like men of education and respectability—such as might become any community; whilst the ladies, to say the least of them, were certainly as fine looking and fashionable, and apparently as refined and accomplished as any one of good taste could wish to see on a summer day.

Genl. Joseph Smith, the Prophet, was on board, as we were informed, but from some cause, did not make himself visible. Perhaps he did not choose to be made the lion of an idle curiosity.

We are informed that the Mormons have purchased part of the site of Shokoum, some six miles below this place, on the Illinois side of the Mississippi river, and purpose building up a town there. It was understood here, that the object of the party who visited us, was to take a view of the ground on which they contemplate building their new town.

Nauvoo, their principal city, at the head of the lower Rapids, is said to be improving rapidly, and the church increasing in numbers daily.

From the Juliet Signal. POISON MUSHROOMS.

A little son of J. E. Metcalfe, Esq., of Juliet, was poisoned on Sunday morning by eating what he supposed to be the edible Mushroom, but which proved to be a poisonous species of the fungus. Violent and constant vomiting with excessive thirst, and prostration and edema of the extremities and body, and death ensued rapidly, apparently. Immediately medical aid was called in, and the child recovered.

We publish this instance in order to guard parents and others against accidents of this kind. Cases have occurred in which whole families have been poisoned to death by eating through mistake, the poison for the edible kind of mushroom.

There are several of the fungus tribe which are edible, and deemed by some a luxury; but many of them are most violent poisons. The kind which is most commonly eaten is the Agaricus campestris, which grows in old pastures and sometimes in gardens, and is very easily distinguished from all others by the color of its lamellae or leaves on the underside, which are of a light red or flesh color when it first comes up, turning to a brown or sooty color in a day or two. The gills are white and fleshy, and the stem is short and thick. The kind which is sometimes mistaken for this, as was the case in the present instance is the Agaricus procus, known by the more common appellation of Toad Stool. It resembles the other very much in form and growth, but is able to be mistaken by persons unacquainted with their characteristics; but this which particularly distinguishes it from the other is the color of its lamellae, which are white turning to a dirty white as it grows old. The stem is longer and it grows to a larger size than the other.

This will enable persons ready to distinguish them; but the safer way would be for those unacquainted with the edible kind not to attempt to make use of them, till shown specimens by those well acquainted with them.

TRYING TO PLEASE EVERY BODY. HINTS TO EDITORS.

BY WILLIAM RAY.
"Old, but not rusty."

One reader cries, your strain's too grave,
Too much about religion—
Give some witch and wizard tales,
Of all-evil ghosts with fins and scales,
And feathers like a pigeon.

I love to read, another cries,
Those monstrous, fashionable lies—
In other words, those novels,
Composed of kings, and priests, and lords,
Of border wars, and gothic horde,
That used to live in hovels.

No, no, cries one, we've had enough
Of such confounded love-sick stuff
To create the fair creation—
Give us some recent foreign news—
Of Russian, Tufas, the Poles, or Jews—
Or any other nation.

The man of dull scholastic lore,
Would like to see a little more
Of first-rate scraps of Latin—
The graver Latin would learn the price
Of tea and sugar, fruit and rice—
The dripper, silk and satin.

Another cries, I want more fun—
A witty anecdote or pun,
A rebuff or a ridicule:
Some wish for Palladian news,
And some, perhaps of wiser views,
Would rather hear the fiddle.

The critic, too, of classic skill,
Must dip in gall his gaudier quill,
And scrawl a line that paper:
Of all the literary fools,
He cuts the greatest caper.

Another cries, I want to see
A jumbled-up variety—
Variety in all things;
A miscellaneous, hodge-podge print,
Composed (I only give the hint)
Of multifarious small things.

I want some marriage news, says Miss—
It constitutes my highest bliss—
To hear of wedding plenty;
For, in a time of general rain,
None suffer from a drouth, 'tis plain—
At least, not one in twenty.

I want to hear of deaths, says one,
Of people totally undone
By losses, fire, or fever;
Another grieves, till as we see,
Whether have the full and rise
Of rickon skins and beaver.

Some signify a secret wish,
For, now and then, a favorite dish
Of politics, to suit them;
But here we rest at perfect ease,
For should they swear the moon was cheese,
We never should believe them.

Or grave, or humorous, wild or tame—
Lolly or low, 'tis all the same;
Too haughty, or too humble—
So, brother Editors, pursue:
The path that seems the best to you,
And let the grumbler grumble.

WORK! WORK! WORK!!

THE undersigned wishes to let out a job of up-n-z-a stone quarry, also a lot of 30 cords of stone on the bank of the river.

If any person wishes to get Steamboat wood this fall and coming winter, I will take from 500 to 1000 cords in exchange for bricks. I will also let a job of clay digging late this fall.

DESTRUCTIVE STORM ON THE GULF COAST.

A severe storm occurred on the night of the 13th, says the New Orleans Bulletin of the 29th ultimo, along the Western Coast of Florida, the principal particulars of which, as far as they have transpired are given in the following extract of a letter from a commercial house, dated at Tallahassee, Sept. 17, 1843.

"We were visited on Wednesday night last by one of the most destructive gales ever known in this section. The wind commenced blowing about 10 o'clock in the evening from the S. W. and gradually shifting to E. W. and continued till about five in the morning with such violence as to cause many small houses to fall. A brick store recently erected and not quite finished, was so much injured that the gale and gave way for several feet, the slate and zinc also blew away to considerable extent. This however, is nothing compared with the damage sustained on the sea coast. Port Leon and St. Marks are swept away, with the exception of a few dwellings high up in the city. Not a warehouse in either place is left. A great many goods in both places are destroyed. The loss in Port Leon is estimated at $250,000; and, besides that, fourteen lives were lost at the light house, a few miles below the town, to wit, a Mr. Robertson, wife and three children, who resided there; Dr. Treadwell and daughter, Mr. Jos. Wood, portrait painter of this place; a child of Mr. Mullins of Port Leon, and six negroes. Great fears are entertained for the safety of several of our citizens who were on a visit to James' Island for health and recreation. Schr. Seiler, arrived and discharged on Monday, and rode out without damage. Two boys from New York escaped with little damage. D. C. Wilson lost most of his goods received by the Excel, and all the Tallahassee merchants have participated more or less."

We have Tallahassee papers (the Star and the Floridian) of the 16th inst. The only information which they furnish, in addition to the above, is of the drowning by the flood of the wife and son and four slaves of the Rev. E. Walker, of Shell Point, the destruction of the Railroad bridge at St. Marks, and of serious injury to the Railroad from St. Marks to Port Leon.

The gale was felt at Apalachicola, but not with great severity. The Advertiser of that town has the following paragraph:

"On the 13th instant the wind commenced blowing fresh from the S. and gradually increased until sundown to a gale which continued until next morning at 4, having gradually changed from S. to E. All the wharves are more or less damaged."

The Apalachicola Watchman states that the injured wharves are already repairing. It considers the storm as preliminary to the annual gale, and thinks that it could not have extended far, as vessels arriving in that port since the storm scarcely felt it.

VALUABLE TABLE.

Messrs. Gayland and Tucker.—A few days ago I was much in want of some dry measures of capacity, as I had often been before; but the circumstance had never led me until then to think of the vast numbers of house-holders especially farmers, who suffer inconvenience from the same cause; in fact, I do not believe I should err in rating them at ninety-nine in every hundred. Why, they continue to do so, they think their best bet; but it occurred to me that I might perhaps render them an acceptable service by publishing a list of boxes in a square form, which I made out for my own use, to contain the following quantities: to wit: a barrel, half barrel, bushel, half bushel, peck, half peck, gallon, half gallon, and quart. The square shape was preferred as being far easier to calculate, and the list was immediately sent to my friend Mr. Ruffin, editor of the Farmer's Register. But as many read your Cultivator when ever see his paper, I now send the statement to you, that you may also publish it, if you think it may be useful. A similar table is not to be found in any book that I have ever seen; although it is perfectly obvious to every body that it is much wanted. The advantage to buyers especially would be considerable; for they could always ascertain whether they received their proper quantity of any thing sold by dry measure, if they would only carry the table in their memories, or a memorandum together with a small rule in their pockets.

A box 24 inches by 16 square, and 28 deep will contain a barrel, or 10,562 cubic inches.
A box 24 inches by 16 square, and 14 deep will contain a half barrel, or 5,376 cubic inches.
A box 16 inches by 16 8-10 square, and 8 deep will contain a bushel, or 2,152 1-10 cubic inches.
A box 12 inches by 11 2-10 square, and 8 deep will contain a half bushel, or 1,075 2-10 cubic inches.
A box 8 inches by 8 4-10 square, and 8 deep will contain one peck, or 567 6-10 cubic inches.
A box 8 inches by 8 square, and 4 2-10 deep will contain one half peck, or 263 8-10 cubic inches.
A box 7 inches by 4 square, and 4 8-10 deep will contain a half gallon, or 134 4-10 cubic inches.
A box 4 inches 4 square, and 4 2-10 deep will contain one quart, or 67 2-10 cubic inches.
These measures all come within a small fraction of a cubic inch of being perfectly accurate as near, indeed, as any measures of capacity have ever yet been made for common use; the difficulty of making them with absolute exactness, has never yet been overcome.—Cab. and Vis.

MR. BENNETT'S LETTERS FROM EUROPE.

No. V.

Paris, 11th Sept. 1843.

I arrived here last week from London, in the midst of the finest weather I have ever seen. Our trip to Paris has been delightful and full of incident. We shall embark on the 24th instant, on board the Argo at Havre, Captain Anthony, for New York, and expect to reach home by the middle or end of October.

You will see by the English papers that O'Connell and his train continue to rail against me and the New York Herald, in the most ridiculous terms. I shall repay them all when I get home; for I have collected materials on the state of England that will be interesting and amusing. I have been so busy travelling and collecting facts that I have had little time to write, or arrange any materials for publication. Both France and England are in a very interesting condition, and a full view of the state of parties, religion, commerce, manufactures, and the progress of society, will require some time and leisure to arrange for the press.

In this great metropolis I have been engaged for several days in visiting the public places, collecting financial information; and attending the theatres. Last evening I saw for the first time, Mlle. Rachel, in the tragedy of Chimene. She is without either beauty or grace, but possesses the rarest simplicity and the deepest energy, with a most striking deep-toned voice of astonishing power. She is the most unique and remarkable actress I ever saw; and her style more resembles that of old Edmund Kean than any other artist I have seen. The house was crowded from top to bottom. She was received with a general "hush—hush—hush," as if to prevent the noise and applause from impeding their relish of the actress's talents. The French theatre, where she plays, is the real legitimate drama; I suppose there was 2,000 dollars in the house, badly dressed generally, and very common looking people; the dress circle by no means so superb as that of the Park is on a fashionable night. There is no music, no orchestra, no flummery; no nonsense at the theatre Francaise; nothing but legitimate tragedy or comedy.—This has a singular effect upon a stranger. All the theatres in Paris are nearly crowded every night; there seems to be no decay of a taste for the drama in Paris; there is in London and New York.

The King has returned to St. Cloud after having received a visit from Queen Victoria at Deau, which furnished the newspapers for a week with an extraordinary fund of small talk and twaddle.

BUTTER.

Butter has been sold exceedingly low in the markets. One reason is it cannot be kept sweet. All perishable produce varies much in price. Lemons and oranges are sold from one to six cents each, according to abundance or scarcity in the market. But grain or salt, or other goods that may be kept from year to year, never vary so much in price. If butter should be so made that it may be kept sweet, we should not find the price varying so much at different seasons of the year.

Some practice scolding the cream before churning, but we have not yet seen trials enough of this to warrant a conclusion. The Highland Society find that sweet milk and cream cannot be churned to butter. We have always supposed it could not—yet we hear much said about keeping the cream sweet till churning time!

Cream undergoes a chemical change on churning, and it is well known that sour cream will make good butter. We would not encourage a practice of keeping cream in unclean vessels, but we would have our dairy women know where in consists the danger in manufacturing butter. It is the management of it after the chemical change has taken place. It is in suffering that part of the cream which the butter would be rid of on churning, to remain with it to putrify.

A subsequent change will take place in pure butter sooner than in pure fat or tallow. We render these pure by acid and entirely separating all impurities. If we do as much for butter, after churning, we may keep it as long as we keep tallow. This has been tried, and butter has been kept a long time without selling.

We see that the Scotch wash their butter as well as work it to separate the buttermilk.—Strong prejudices are here entertained against washing, but we have found the benefits of it in our own dairy. Several gallons should be dashed in, successfully, till the water ceases to be colored; then the labor of working out what remains will be light.—Mass. Ploughman.

James S. Pope, Esq. of Edgefield, (S. C.) has succeeded in making a syrup from green corn cobs, equal to the best sugar molasses. He estimates a production of 75 gallons from an acre of corn under good cultivation.

Old Virginia—is going heartily into the business of manufacturing.

The Petersburg Intelligencer states that the manufacturing establishments in that town and vicinity are in thriving condition. There are eight cotton factories in the town, some of them on a large scale and in active operation.

Fifty Dollar Treasury Notes.—The New York correspondent of the United States Gazette says, that the secretary of the treasury is about to issue notes of the denomination of 50 dollars for circulation. They will be filled up to one uniform order, and made payable at some one bank in New York on demand in specie. They are to bear interest at the rate of one tenth of one cent, per 100 dollars per day, and the New York banks have agreed to receive them on deposit. Therefore there is no doubt they will obtain an extensive circulation. The amount to be issued is, I am informed, 500,000 dollars.

Price of a Copy Right.—James Arlington Bennett, L. D., of Long Island, sold to the Messrs. Harpers, publishers, New York, last Friday afternoon, the copy right of his celebrated work on bookkeeping, for the sum of forty thousand dollars.

FALL & WINTER READY MADE CLOTHING.

At wholesale and retail.
M. BROWN, at 52 Main street, St. Louis, has already received several shipments, and will continue to receive weekly fresh supplies of superior ready made clothing, the goods of which were bought at auction, for cash, previous to the late advance on goods, and made up under his immediate direction by a wholesale clothing house in the city of New York, with which he is connected. His stock will be large, comprising every article kept in a clothing or furnishing store.

Having one of the best cutters in the United States to superintend that department, he is confident his garments will compare successfully with any in this city, in fashion, beauty, make or fit.

Persons visiting St. Louis for the purpose of replenishing their wardrobes, either in clothing or furnishing articles, will do well to call on the subscriber, where they will not only find the most fashionable and best made garments, but at prices decidedly lower than any other house in the city of St. Louis.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

CAMPHOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after disposition, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents,) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

TAYLOR & WOODRUFF.
Nauvoo, May 3, 18

the fashion of the day, inclined a little over the left ear, from under which some wiry sandy colored hair, just showed its edges. In his hand he held a stout cotton umbrella, with which he ever and anon evinced his dislike to the slightest curving on the part of his horse by a thump on the flank. Here was an old figure of 'Peace and Quietness,' in strange contrast to the surrounding din of war and conflict. Occasionally he would rise in his stirrups, as fresh shouts of onslaught reached his ear, or sudden peals of thunder from a quarter attracted his attention. Then setting down into the saddle, he would wait complacently the result, or watch with undisturbed countenance and amazing sang froid, the course of a stray shot furrowing the earth right or left of his person. Suddenly his Grace turned quickly round, as though seeking somebody to whom he would deliver an order, when his eye rested upon the unsuited personage whom we have described; it then glanced in other directions, and then returned to the daring but passive spectator.

Who, and what are you sir? inquired the commander, in quick and authoritative accents.

Me sir, replied his companion out of arms, bestowing a blow upon the flank of his animal; my name is Jones, I am travelling agent to Smith and Jenkins, of Holborn, in the hardware line.

Here was a pause, during which the Duke seemed for a second, but a second, to withdraw his mind from the immense responsibility of his situation; when the last speaker continued:

I was at Brussels for orders, and understood there was to be a fight, so I came to see it. I am rather thinking if I don't mind, I shall have only borrowed pay for this horse, which I have only borrowed for the occasion. There (pointing to some scattered earth) that shot would have spoilt my day's pleasure; but I shall see it out.

Mr. Jones, said his Grace, I want an order conveyed to a certain position;—would you serve your country and oblige me by delivering it?

Oh dear, yes, instantly replied the bag man with another whack on the beast. I don't mind going a bit, what is it?

Hereupon the Duke pointed out the quarter, bidding him inquire for General —, and communicate to him a certain command.

But it is a question whether I'll believe me, observed the wary bag man, half doubtingly.

Take this ring, added the Duke, giving him a signet.

And a minute after the traveler was on his way amidst the battle, with an order in which the firm of Smith and Jenkins had no participation. The General's eye followed him as he escaped the ball, and many hundreds were slain.

The due time the effects of the order were manifest, and the strife was done. Nothing more was seen of the adventurous bag man. The Duke made many inquiries for Mr. Jones, but in vain; and he at length came to the conclusion of his having fallen with other 'good men and true.' Many years had elapsed when a servant at Aspley House announced the name of a visitor, one Mr. Jones. The Duke happened to be disengaged, and gave permission for him to enter his presence, when who should present himself but the 'civil' hero of Waterloo, who, with scarcely any change of costume from that which he wore on the memorable day, advanced, saying:

I am Mr. Jones, if your Grace remembers a trifling service.

I remember a great and personal one, my dear sir, said his Grace, interrupting him, and shaking his hand. How can I serve you?

Why, I am of the firm of Smith and Jenkins, in the hardware line, and the honor of your patronage and government patronage.

I shall not fail to exert myself in your behalf, said his Grace; but what became of you immediately after you delivered your order to General —?

I can scarcely tell, replied Mr. Jones, looking up the ceiling. At first I got into the corn field among one regiment, then over a hedge among another, then into the wrong reserve among the French, then my horse was killed, then I was again among a square while the light lasted between our horse soldiers and Bonaparte's horse soldiers (and yours bet 'em fairly), and then I got out of a charge, and hid up a bit, and after that was engaged in nothing to do with the fight, and so I didn't join one side nor the other.

The Duke kept his word. If some of the government clerks of the present day, when they stir for the hundredth time their winter office fire, can find leisure to examine their papers, they will find stamped thereon, "Smith, Jenkins and Jones, makers."

Foreign News

FROM CHINA.

U. S. Ship Constellation, Manila Bay, May 6th, 1843. We left Macao Roads on the morning of the 22d ultimo, and anchored in this port about midnight of the 30th. It is generally understood that we are now bound homeward.

Just before leaving China, the commander addressed a somewhat long communication to the Viceroy of Canton, relative to American affairs and interests. The Viceroy is said to appear to be of opinion that Americans will enjoy the same privileges as other foreigners, without the necessity of treaty stipulations, and reiterates the assurance that the claims of our citizens for damages sustained in the December riot at Canton shall be promptly paid at the stipulated time.

Hitherto the commodore's communications have generally been received by a Chinese officer dispatched from the city for that purpose at the Canton House, or office of the Hong Merchants; or at the American Consulate.

On this occasion, Lieutenant R., the bearer of the communication, was directed to proceed to the city gates, and there to ask to be permitted to enter and deliver it to the Viceroy in person.

On his arrival at the city gates he was directed to return and forward the communication through the Hong merchants. This was of course contrary to his instructions, and he was therefore invited to the nearest Government office, just within the gates, where, on the arrival of the proper officer he delivered the commodore's card, and stated the object of his visit.

The Governor declined admitting him into his presence under pretext of ill health and directed that it should be received by an officer of a rank corresponding very nearly to that of Colonel, to whom it was accordingly delivered. The streets in the vicinity and through which Lieutenant R. had to pass on his return, were thronged with natives, eagerly curious to see the 'foreign officer, who with his waving plumes and full dress uniform, was by no means an unobtrusive object. The depotment of the crowd is represented as having been in every way respectful.

I was informed by Mr. Alcorn, the Spanish diplomatic agent resident at Macao, that the Governor of Canton had assured him that the same privileges would be granted to that nation as to Great Britain, with the exception of an island; and I am further informed by the secretary of the Philippine Islands, that this arrangement includes specifically privileges of commerce and the right of residence at those ports to which foreigners are admitted.

The French have also been engaged in some negotiations, but I am not definitely informed of the results; though I presume that they have been at least partially successful. In acknowledging one of the communications of the French agent, the term Pas de port was used by the Viceroy, who was immediately informed that neither the King of the French nor his agents desired to petition for anything. An apology was promptly rendered.

That a decided change has taken place in the policy of the Celestials is quite obvious. But it must be remembered nevertheless that the Viceroy, or Governor of Canton is but a subordinate authority; and unless his orders have the sanction of the Emperor, the Central Government will have the power to disavow his proceedings.

The Chinese extend their mouth of Canton river extensively, and though their works are not in all respects upon the most approved principles, they surpass by far the old forts which the English destroyed.

At this port the cholera has prevailed for some time past, principally amongst the lower classes of the native population. It is said to be abating somewhat, and to be a comparatively mild form of this terrible scourge of the east.

We are anchored about three miles from the shore, and many precautions have been taken. No officers, except the commodore and Purser, have been allowed to visit the shore, and no fault except in one instance for the Hospital Department, has been permitted to come on board.

Until last evening we escaped the disease. Since that time we have had four cases, two of which have already proved fatal. We shall get under weigh, and stand out into the Bay in a few hours, and as soon as the accounts can be settled, probably proceed to sea. By this means we hope to check the progress of the disease. — Boston Daily Ad.

HAYTIAN COMMERCIAL REGULATIONS.

The following is published by authority:—

Department of State, Washington, October 7th, 1843.

The following laws bearing upon our commerce, recently enacted by the Government of Hayti, to take effect on the 12th day of September, 1843, were this day received from the United States Commercial Agent at Hayti.

The tonnage duty heretofore exacted on foreign vessels, at one dollar Spanish per ton, (consequently American vessels pay two dollars and twenty cents per ton.)

All foreign vessels going from one port to another, in this island will pay for each port visited, an additional duty of one hundred dollars, Haytian currency, on vessels under one hundred and fifty tons.

Vessels from one hundred and fifty to two hundred tons, pay one hundred and fifty dollars.

Vessels of two hundred tons and upwards, pay two hundred Haytian dollars. The duties on wharfage and weighage on merchandise imported, are increased to double their former rates.

The Territorial duty on exports is still in force; but the duty of exportation is reduced, which reduces the export duty on coffee from twenty dollars Haytian currency per thousand pounds to twelve dollars.

Cocoa from ten dollars to four per one thousand pounds.

Tobacco in leaf, from fifteen dollars per one thousand pounds to five dollars.

Logwood from seven dollars per one thousand pounds to two dollars.

Mahogany from twenty-two dollars to twelve dollars per thousand feet.

Hides of all kinds are free of export duty.

The wharfage and the weighage and measuring are to be added to the foregoing quantities as follows:—

On coffee, one dollar Haytian currency. Cocoa one dollar. Tobacco one dollar. Logwood one dollar. Mahogany one dollar. Hides are charged one cent Haytian each.

The present value of a Haytian dollar is two fifths (2/5ths) of a Spanish or American silver dollar, or sixty per cent. below their par.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMER HIBERNIA, AT BOSTON.

The Hibernia, Captain Judkins, arrived at Boston at about two o'clock Wednesday afternoon.

We have Liverpool papers to the 4th, and London to the morning of the same day.

Among the passengers in the Hibernia were the Hon. Abbott Lawrence and family.

Business throughout the whole of Europe continued in a most prosperous condition.

The Hibernia brings a very large number of passengers.

The Britannia arrived out in 12-1/2 days from Boston. Captain Hewitt was sick during the whole passage.

The Southerner, of New York, arrived at Liverpool on the 20th, the Columbus the next day, and the Ashburton on the 3d inst.

The most important items of news are the loss of the East India Mail Steamer and the Revolution in Greece.

The political state of Europe seems to be more critical and alarming than it has been for years. An unrecurrent disaffection, long pent up by the force of circumstances, seems to have burst its fetters, and is now careering his course onward among the nations. In Ireland, the repeal question shakes the country to its centre—Wales, from south to north, is in open rebellion against the laws—Spain hatches a new revolution about once a month—Italy is troubled with intestine broils, and is fast verging upon anarchy—France is hatching conspiracies against the royal power—and Poland is giving unequivocal symptoms that the yoke of the oppressor still sits uneasily upon the necks of her people.

Another great eruption had taken place from the crater of Mount Vesuvius, exhibiting a beautiful appearance, and almost turning night into day at Naples.

The Hon. Caleb Cushing, Minister of the United States to the Court of China, left Gibraltar on the afternoon of the 7th September, under a salute of 15 guns from the garrison, and embarked on board the Orizaba steamer for Alexandria.

A good many emigrants are about leaving various parts of Europe for Algiers—their inducements held out to them by the French government being considered very inviting.

Many arrests were made at Naples on the occasion of the fête of the Madonna di Piedigrotta.

The strikes at a large number of the collieries in England still continued at the last accounts, and fears were entertained that the winter supply of coal would be short.

One of the London papers hints plainly that the Queen is again getting into a delicate situation. Good gracious!

The Agram Gazette says, that the inhabitants of Bihacz in Croatia were about to march against the Prasha, under the guidance of Omar Beg. The cause of this revolt is not stated.

The Paris papers state that the sensation created by the agitation of the question of the fortifications of Paris, had not diminished in the least.

On the 13th ult., at Torres, near Jaen, in Spain, an avalanche killed 200 persons and destroyed 42 houses.

A letter from Berlin of the 13th inst., announces the failure of Rick & Co., of Iserlohn, Westphalia, manufacturers, for 4,000,000 thalers, (about 600,000.)

The circumstantial account of the arrest of Richard Dodd, the supposed paricide, at Fontainebleau, charged with another crime, seems to be without foundation.

On dit, that Sir Robert Peel has made overtures to Lord John Russell for a coalition ministry.

Every year some new sects occupy much attention in the religious world. Pamphlets and works of all kinds, pro and con, are teeming from the press.

The Reverend Dr. Kelley, a Presbyterian minister, is under arrest at Madeira, on the charge of preaching to the natives in his own house.

Cape of Good Hope papers to July 2, state that Col. Cloete has announced to the Boers in the vicinity of Port Natal, the determination of the British government to adopt Natal as a British colony, and to place it under British laws and rule. Every demonstration of aversion and hostility was shown upon this communication, and military precautions have been therefore adopted.

The Borndorff, of Hamburg, says that the disturbances which took place a few days ago near the Millers Gate were repeated yesterday, but the troops soon restored tranquility. The tumult was greatest outside the Gate—several persons were wounded, and a large number of arrests were made.

Great activity prevailed in all the English Navy yards, and orders had been received to fit out for immediate service nearly all the vessels in ordinary. The cause of these movements was a matter of much speculation and inquiry.

The Journal de l'Indre announces that General Bertrand (now in the United States), has made a present to the municipality of his native town, Chateaufort, of the following articles: the sabre worn by Napoleon in Egypt, the large decoration of the Legion of Honor, which he wore for a long period; the small decoration of the same order, the cross of the iron crown, a silver gilt necklace which he had with him in his campaigns, a part of the books which composed his library at St. Helena, and a copy of the full-length portrait of Napoleon in Egypt, by Gros.

The Barcelona papers of the 10th announce that the two Carlist chiefs, Zola and Morellan, have collected hands, and are devastating the towns of Catalonia, in their despair, have flung themselves into the arms of the Carlists.

The Moniteur publishes a report of the French Finance Minister, stating that he will need a supplement of fifteen millions of francs to his budget. The China Finance station is to consist of two or three frigates. The French have 207 armed vessels afloat.

The Emperor of Russia is at Berlin where the two monarchs walk through the streets unattended by any guard, whilst the inhabitants cause them no inconvenience. This fashion seems to be gaining ground among crowned heads of mixing with the people. These are halcyon days for them.

Drury Lane Theatre opened for the season on Saturday, Sept. 30, with Balfe's opera of the Siege of Rochelle, and the new ballet of Peri. The management devolves upon Mr. Bunn, whose chequered career of the great London Theatres is familiar to the public on both sides of the Atlantic.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 8, 1843.

WOOD! WOOD!

WE would respectfully notify those who have promised us wood, that we are in want of it; and if they are as willing to fulfill as they were to make promises, we shall be supplied with an abundance of this indispensable article soon.

Persons wishing to become subscribers to the Times and Seasons, or Neighbor, can now have the opportunity of doing so, by leaving their names at our office, and forwarding the amount in wood.

TAYLOR & WOODRUFF.

Several companies of emigrants have lately arrived in this place by steam boats, all apparently in good health and spirits.

Elder Erastus Snow, arrived with a company from Massachusetts, on Monday last.

The Twelve who have lately been on a mission to the east, have all returned, and enjoy the usual health and spirits.

A number of emigrants from England are expected soon.

The WEATHER.—Winter seems to be approaching us with rapid strides. We have had several nights of severe frost, and now while we write, every thing presents a hoary aspect, vegetation has gone beneath its withering influence, and the yellow sedge leaf, and naked fields tell us that Jack Frost has begun to make his annual ravages.

WHO SHALL BE OUR NEXT PRESIDENT?—This question we frequently hear asked, and it is a question of no small importance to the Latter Day Saints.

We as a people have labored, and are still laboring under great injustice from the hands of a neighboring state. The Latter Day Saints have had their property destroyed and their houses made desolate by the hands of the Missourians; murders have been committed, with impunity, and many in consequence of oppression, barbarism and cruelty, have slept the sleep of death. They have been obliged to flee from their possessions into a distant land, in the chilling frost of December; robbed, spoiled, despoiled, homeless, and homeless; without any just pretext or shadow of law; without having violated the laws of that state, or of the United States, and have had to wander as exiles in a strange land, without as yet, being able to obtain any redress for their grievances. We have hitherto adopted every legal measure; first, we petitioned to the state of Missouri, but in vain. We have memorialized Congress, but they have turned a deaf ear to our supplication and referred us again to the state, and justice (if of Missouri). Doubtless many of the members of that honorable body were not sufficiently informed of the enormity and extent of the crimes of our persecutors, nor of the indelible stain which our national escutcheon has received through their inhuman daring. They have been allowed to revel in blood, and luxuriate in the misery of the oppressed, and no man has laid it to heart. The fact is, that gentlemen of respectability and refinement, who live in a civilized society, find it difficult to believe that such enormities could be practiced in a republican government; but our wrong cannot stand; such tyranny and oppression must not be passed over in silence; our injuries though great, are not forgotten by us, they still wrinkle in our bosoms, and the blood of the innocent yet cries for justice; and as American citizens, we have appealed, and shall still continue to appeal to the legally constituted authorities of the land for redress, in the hopes that justice which has long slumbered, may be aroused in our defence; that the spirit which burned in the bosoms of the patriots of seventy-six, may fire the souls of their descendants, and though slow, that their indignation may yet begettered at the injustice of the oppressor, and that they may yet meet out justice to our adversaries, and step forward in the defence of the innocent.

We shall ask no one to commit themselves on our account; we want no steps taken but what are legal, constitutional, and honorable—but we are American citizens, and as American citizens, we have rights in common with all that live under the folds of the "star spangled banner." Our rights have been trampled upon by lawless miscreants, we have been robbed of our liberties by mobocratic influence, and all those honorable ties that ought to govern and characterize Columbia's sons have been trampled in the dust. Still we are American citizens, and as American citizens we claim the privilege of being heard in the councils of our nation. We have been wronged, abused, robbed, and banished, and we seek redress. Such crimes cannot slumber in Republican America. The cause of common humanity would revolt at it, and Republicanism would hide its head in disgust.

We make these remarks for the purpose of drawing the attention of our brethren to this subject, both at home and abroad; that we may fix upon the man who will be the most likely to render us assistance in obtaining redress for our grievances—and not only give our own votes, but use our influence to obtain others, and if the voice of suffering innocence will not sufficiently arouse the rulers of our nation to investigate our case, perhaps a vote of from fifty to one hundred thousand may rouse them from their lethargy.

We shall fix upon the man of our choice, and justify ourselves daily.

Incidents in the burning of the Missouri.—We have heard of two animal occurrences on board this steamer, says the New York American, that strikes us as singular, and at the same time characteristic.

There was on board at the time a pet bear which, as the flames were raging, became more and more excited, until, as they burst forth on the decks, the infuriated animal leapt into their midst and perished.

There was also on board a Newfoundland bitch, with her pup. While the men remained at quarters she too remained, going in and out among them as usual, and calmly as usual; but when the last man had left the ship she went to her kennel, took the pup in her mouth, and running out on the bowsprit, sprang into the water and swam ashore without dropping her precious burden.

Papers from Prince Edward's Island give an account of a serious collision between a detachment of the rifle brigade, stationed there, and a large body of the inhabitants—the latter, it is said, being the assaults, and without provocation. The soldiers retreated in good order, but at length they were surrounded, and one of them struck down by a blow from a stone, whereupon the word was given to charge and cut their way through, which was done, several of the mob receiving severe wounds. — Commercial Advertiser.

Postage.—Many of our contemporaries are contending for a reduction of postage. The present prices are undoubtedly too high, and is certain from the example of England, that the department would derive a large revenue from a lower scale of postage than the present. We hope this subject will be generally agitated till an expression of the people shall require Congress to acquiesce in what is really the interest of the community on this subject. — Hamilton Int.

The Crops.—We have most discouraging accounts of the cotton crop in Burke county, Georgia. The following extracts of letters received by a merchant of Savannah, from large planters, tell a sad story:

Our crops are completely destroyed by the caterpillar. Our fields look like the dead of winter; they have not only eaten the leaves, but the young bolls.

Since you were here our cotton patches have been sheared by the worms of their leaves, bolls and bolls, as completely as it is possible to imagine. On many farms one third is lost.

Manufactures in Illinois.—The editor of the Chicago Democrat states that the cloths now being manufactured at Green's mill, in La Salle county, are equal to any brought from the east and better at the price. Having been recently elected to Congress, Mr. Wortworth, editor of the Democrat, has bought a suit of this premium cloth on purpose to take to Washington, and thus show by acts rather than talk that he believes in patronizing home industry; the best kind of protection.

The population of the kingdom of Prussia, according to the census just made is 15,300,000 souls; and it is therefore, the fifth state in Europe in point of population.

Philosophy.—A man by the name of Philo, who was married to a lady whose name was Sophy, observed, that in uniting his name with the lady's put him in possession of Philo sophy.

The Repeal Policy.—In the Wexford Independent, one of Mr. O'Connell's own organs, especially favored by his patronage, and intimately acquainted with his views, we find the following information for the benefit of the repealers. It may be considered the ultimatum in the event of the Queen's refusal to repeal the Union.

1. The people are not to work for any man who is not a repealer.
2. The people are to abandon the consumption of all articles paying taxes.
3. The people are to let their landlords (take their rent, passive resistance being the only plan of bringing them to their senses).

4. The people are to wear nothing whatever of British manufacture.

Commerce of the Mississippi.—Last year the first steamboat arrived at the port of Bloomington on the 5th day of March, and up to the 20th of October, the number of arrivals from above and below was 392. The present season the first arrival was on the 12th of April, one month and seven days later, and up to this date the arrivals number 400; eleven more than we had at this time last year. From this some idea may be formed of the increase of the trade on the upper Mississippi.

A London paper says that the rumor is rife that Peel and the Duke of Wellington have expressed themselves as inclined to make a trial of having the Imperial Parliament once every three years in Dublin.

On the 5th of September a terrible conflagration occurred at Stuhlweissenburg, in Hungary. Nearly 1000 houses were reduced to ashes.

Ecce!—One asked his friend why he, being a stout man himself, had married so small a wife. Why, friend, said he, I thought that you had known that of all evils we should choose the least.

We know that statements made by the Carthage mob in their resolutions as published in the late Warsaw Message were false; we also felt convinced that the parties themselves were apprised of that fact, and that it was a thing generally understood by the public and therefore we did not trouble ourselves about it; but having the following testimonies and affidavits sent us for publication, we insert them for the information of those who may not have had opportunities of information themselves relative to this subject. State of Illinois, Lee County, ss.

We, the undersigned citizens of the town of Dixon, county of Lee, State of Illinois, being duly sworn according to law depose and say that we have seen the article entitled "Statement of facts connected with the arrest of Joseph Smith, and his discharge therefrom," published in the Warsaw Message of the date of 15th of July, A. D. 1843; and have also seen an editorial article in the same number of said paper, in which it is stated that said statement of facts was furnished by F. Southwick, one of Mr. Smith's attorneys; and that we know the fact stated in said statement, to wit, that Reynolds for a considerable length of time immediately after his arrival at Dixon, did peremptorily refuse to allow Smith a private interview with his counsel, and that said Reynolds did expressly state that no conversation could be had with Smith, by his attorneys, unless he, Reynolds, was present at such conversation.

The length of time, which such refusal to allow said private conversation continued, was, in the belief of these deponents, at least one hour; and that such private conversation was not permitted by Reynolds, until after being informed by at least two of these deponents, (Messrs Dixon and Langer) that such private interview must be allowed. Mr. Southwick as that was a right he had guaranteed to him by law.

JOHN DIXON, ISAAC ROBINSON, L. P. SANGER, J. D. MCCOMSA, J. ALBERT HILFENSTIEN, S. G. PATRICK, E. SOUTHWICK.

We, the undersigned, state under oath that we travelled in company with Joseph H. Reynolds, the agent of the State of Missouri, from Dixon to Nauvoo, at the time he had Joseph Smith in custody with the intention of taking him to Missouri, between the 26th of June last, and the first instant, and that the Mormons, friends of Mr. Smith, who met us on said journey, before we arrived at Nauvoo, conducted themselves, so far as we could perceive, and were able to judge, with the strictest propriety; and to our knowledge made use of no means towards either H. D. Wilson, or said Reynolds; but on the contrary, several of them and said Smith among that number, pledged themselves personally safe; and that said Mormons, none of them, as we could perceive, were armed, so far as we discerned, and further that the statement made in the "Old School Democrat" of the 12th inst., over the signature of T. H. Reynolds, that he and said Wilson were disarmed soon after they were arrested, on the trespass suit commenced against them by said Smith, and that their arms were not returned to them, until after the said Smith's discharge at Nauvoo, was incorrect, and in relation to this, these deponents say that said Wilson and Reynolds were arrested on said action of trespass, at Dixon on Saturday morning, the 24th of June last; that they were not disarmed by the sheriff of Lee county, who had them in custody, nor by any other person until the following day, at Paw Paw grove, thirty-two miles distant from Dixon, and that the arms of said Wilson and Reynolds were restored to them by the said sheriff of Lee county, who had them in custody for default of bail, at their, Wilson's and Reynolds', own request, while on the journey from Dixon to Nauvoo, before the company had arrived within at least eighty miles of Nauvoo.

J. D. MCCOMSA, L. P. SANGER, J. ALBERT HILFENSTIEN, S. G. PATRICK, E. SOUTHWICK.

To the Editor of the Warsaw Message.—Gent. It appears from an article in your paper of the 15th of July, under the editorial head, that there is a question of veracity there raised, between Mr. H. T. Wilson and myself, relative to the proceedings had after the late arrest by him of Joseph Smith. Now in order that the public may no longer be deceived, in the premises, be pleased to publish together with this note, the above affidavits that the charge of falsehood may attach where it properly belongs.

Very respectfully yours,

E. SOUTHWICK.

Dixon, July 29, 1843.

The Sea shall give up its dead.—On leaving the harbor of St. Mary's a short time since, the people in the boat saw a large red chest on the water, toward which they directed their boat's course, and succeeded in obtaining the chest.

This, on being opened, was found to contain the corpse of a young and beautiful female, clothed in a rich silk dress, and having three solid gold rings upon her fingers. And this was all that could be learned concerning her; who she had been, or the circumstances of her death remain to us still sealed; it is most likely, however, that the fair young creature had died at sea, and her body been committed to the waters of the deep, which thus had yielded it up again.

It only remains for us to add that the chest, with the body in it, just as it lay when first opened, was consigned to the grave, with the appropriate and solemn rites of Christian burial, in St. Mary's.—Newfoundland Post.

A Miser's Prayer.—Among many curious papers found at the decease of John Ward, member of the British Parliament for Hackney, there was one in his own hand writing, of which the following is a copy. It is an admirable satire, and we commend it to certain persons who must be nameless:—

"Oh Lord, thou knowest that I have my houses in the city of London, and likewise that I have lately purchased an estate in fee simple in the county of Essex; I beseech thee to preserve the county of Middlesex and Essex from fire and earthquakes; and as I have a mortgage in Arfordshire, I beg of thee likewise to have an eye of compassion on that county; and, for the rest of the counties that mayest deal with them as thou art pleased, Oh Lord, enable the bank to answer all their bills, and make all my debtors good men. Give a prosperous voyage and return to the Mermaid ship, because I have insured it; and as thou hast said that the days of the wicked are but short, I trust in thee thou wilt not forget thy promise as I have purchased an estate in reversion, which will be mine on the death of that most profligate young man, Sir J. L.—Keep my friends from sinking, and preserve me from thieves and house-breakers, and make all my servants as honest and faithful, that they may attend to my interest, and never cheat me out of my property night or day."

A Bright Boy.—Father, what does the printer say? Why, child, cause you and you didn't pay him for two or three years, and yet you have his paper every week, and all the subscribers serve him in the same way. I don't see, for my part, what is to hinder the printer lives on. Wife, put that boy to bed—he's got no more manners than a young heathen.

At the Central Criminal Court yesterday, Joaquim Gonsalves, a Spaniard, was indicted for assaulting Mr. Aspinwall, the Consul for the United States. It appeared that the prisoner had for a considerable period of time annoyed the prosecutor and his clerks, at the office in Bishopsgate street, by claiming to be a citizen of the United States, and demanding to be sent home. Upon the occasion which led to the present indictment, the prisoner was very violent, and laid hold of the prosecutor and attempted to pull him down stairs. The prisoner was found guilty, and ordered to be imprisoned for a month, and to enter into recognizances to keep the peace.

Ancient recipe for the cure of the Gout. The ingredients for this remedy cannot be had without a little theft, but as no one's stock will be endangered, the sufferers will be content to run a little risk in order to obtain great relief.

1st. He must pick a handkerchief from the pocket of a maid of fifty years, who never had a wish to change her condition.

2d. He must wash it in an honest miller's pond.

3d. He must dry it on a parson's hedge that was never covetous.

4th. He must send it to a doctor's shop that never killed a patient.

5th. He must mark it with a lawyer's ink who never cheated a client. Apply it to the part affected, and a cure will speedily follow.

Judge Recommending Criminals not to plead Guilty.—Where it happens to a prisoner to answer in the affirmative, in appropriate language, to plead guilty, if he insists on it, the general understanding seems to be that he has a right to have such his plea recorded, in which case there is a necessary end of the trial, and the verdict follows of course. In practice, it is grown into a sort of fashion, when a prisoner has returned this answer, for the judge to endeavour to persuade him to withdraw it, and substitute the opposite plea, the plea of not guilty, in its place. The wicked man, repenting of his wickedness, offers what atonement is in his power; the judge, the chosen minister of righteousness, bids him repent of his repentance, and in place of the truth, substitute a barefaced lie. Such is the morality, such the holiness of the English judge.—Benthamiana.

HOW TO MAKE A TE-TOTAL-ER.

EVAPORATION—ITS POWER—ON, THE IN-GENUITY OF TIPIPLING RATS.

Mr. C., commission merchant of this city, is known as an extensive holder of Western produce; and his stock is not more noted for its variety than for the superiority of the several articles which he keeps on hand. His per centage on the sale of Monongahela whiskey through the year would be a man of moderate notions, be reckoned a liberal in coming. Customers came so quick to purchase, that to save the trouble of too frequently a recurrence to the barrel, he has been in the habit of keeping a sample-bottle in the store, always full or partially so, for their trial and inspection. He had found, for a long time, that the contents of the sample-bottle decreased very rapidly, daily, and in a manner at first, very mysteriously. He soon learned, however, that Sampson, the negro who stood in the store, was anything but a Washingtonian; and that he tried the strength of the Monongahela often than the whole of his customers. Desirous to know if his conscientiousness was as large as his alimmentiveness, he said to him on Monday night,

"Sampson, why is it that the whiskey in the sample-bottle diminishes so fast? Why, it has to be filled daily."

"Clare Go, Massa, I doesn't know," said Sampson, looking as serious as a converted sinner at a camp-meeting. "But I tink, massa, it's carried off by de principles ob wot white folks call 'evaporation.'"

"Of you do Sampson?" said Mr. C.

"Does, sartin, massa," said Sampson. "I tell you dat ere 'evaporation's' right strong. Gosh, it aint left a drop of hard cider in de country. I tink it's dat wot makes de wiskey so scarce, and not de tem'p'rance movement; as dey call it."

"Well then Sampson," said Mr. C., "fill the bottle now, and I will cork it so tight as to prevent evaporation."

"Yes sa," said Sampson. He filled the bottle; his master corked it, evaporation tight, and again it was placed on the shelf. Again, on Tuesday morning, it was found to have decreased considerably in quantity, and still more towards noon.

"Well, Sampson," said Mr. C., "find the whiskey is still rapidly decreasing. How do you account for it now?"

"Wa-wall, it be berry hard to 'splain, massa," said Sampson, "it be one ob dose 'sterious' disappearances wot a nigger can't 'count for, and wot sometimes puzzles white folks, I tell you."

"But what is your opinion, said Mr. C."

"Wall, I tink," said Sampson, "to tell you a nightry-true, dat de rats be drink in it, for day hasn't joined de tem'p'rance 'society, as I knows on."

"Yes," said Mr. C., "but when it would get down as low as the centre of the bottle, how would the rats manage to get at it then?"

"Yah! yah! yah!" said Sampson; but, suppressing suddenly his cackling, he added, "Look heah, massa, I was just a goin to say as how you was green. Now, does you tink as how dem dere rats wot you sees about de store, and wot's so much in de car-baret at de corner—does you tink, I axes, dat seen so many takin jilups on de suction principle, dat dey doesn't know de use ob a straw? Wal, I reck-on dey does, massa."

"Well then, Sampson," said Mr. C., "if the sample-bottle can neither be preserved from the rats nor evaporation, I must only submit to the loss and fill it whenever it is empty. Fill it now, and leave it again upon the shelf, and I care not whether you cork it or not."

Mr. C. told an acquaintance of his, an apothecary, of Sampson's partiality to the sample-bottle, and asked him if he could not give him some decoction to mix with it, which, while it would not visibly alter its color or taste, would prove less agreeable to Sampson's system than the pure Monongahela. The apothecary told him he could, and on the Tuesday before last, he furnished the required preparation. Sampson was sent on an errand in the early part of the day, and in his absence the obnoxious ingredients were introduced into the whiskey.

To give Sampson a better scope, when he returned, his master went out, and staid away long enough to give the sample-tasting Sampson full play at the bottle. When he returned, he noticed a strange and peculiar rolling of Sampson's eyes; his lips were the color of stale venison; and he had all the singular characteristics in his appearance of a 'tick nigger.'—Mr. C. managed to keep him pretty busy, and although appearing not to notice him, closely watched his movements.

"Wot!" he would shout, raising his leg up against his stomach, but still endeavoring to conceal his pain from his master, and again he would exclaim, "Ah! e-ech! wot!! gornamity!!!" and he would brace his belly around with his hands and arms. At length, finding himself growing worse—that there was no chance of the pain abating—he threw himself on the floor, and roared out, "Oh! massa, dis child's a gone nigger—oh! a-a-ah! oh-o-o-oh!!"

"Why, what's the matter, Sampson?" said Mr. C., appearing to be suddenly astonished at the state of Sampson's bowels.

"Oh! massa," said Sampson, "oh! ee! ah! o-o-oh! massa, I'se a gone chicken; ah! ee! o oh!" and he wriggled about on the floor like a pea on a griddle, his eyes revolving like the beacon of a light-house, and his color changing like a dying dolphin.

"Why, what's the matter with you?" said his master.

"Oh! I doesn't know, massa, but I guess I'se got de Tyler gripe, and de influenza, and black vomit, and all de oder 'plaints in general, and 'tick-lar on de high pressure, roarin ribber principle—oh, ah!"

The master offered Sampson a drink out of the sample bottle to cure him, but he turned from it as if it were a poison of the deadliest quality.

"Oh, I see how it is," said Mr. C., "he has been drinking the whiskey that I had impregnated with poison to kill the rats."

Sampson, in lugubrious tones, confessed he had. A dose of castor oil was administered to him, and in a short time he was 'as good as new.'

Since then, neither the rats nor evaporation interfere with the sample-bottle, and Sampson is as strict a te-totaler, as if he had taken the pledge from Father Mathew.

DREADEFUL STEAMBOAT EXPLOSION.

The New Orleans papers bring us an account of another of those terrible accidents which occur so often on the western waters. The steamboat Clipper, commanded by the veteran of the Mississippi, Captain Laurent, who ran her as a regular packet between Byron Sara and New Orleans, burst her boilers on the morning of the 19th ultimo, while leaving Byron Sara on her way to Byron Tunicia, for the purpose of taking a portion of freight. By this accident, the cabin, upper deck, wheelhouse, and boilers were completely blown away; the body of the boat was literally broken amidships and sunk. The crew consisted of 43 persons. One of the cabin passengers, Mr. L. Thomas, of Byron Sara, is missing; and the other, Mr. Montemart, merchant of New Orleans, would not probably recover from his wounds. The Chronicle gives the following summary, from which it appears that 28 persons were undoubtedly killed:

Captain Laurent escaped unhurt; Mr. Bessy, chief clerk, missing, and the second clerk killed; John Tyson, chief engineer, badly wounded, had both legs amputated; William Sumter, second engineer, thrown 150 or 200 yards through the roof and gable end of a house into the back yard against the fence; one arm was torn off and the fragments of his carcase scattered over the trees; William Nelson, 3d engineer, free man of color, killed; Armand J. Kavan, pilot, missing; William Wall, pilot, killed; John Patterson, mate, badly scalded though likely to recover; Gabriel Pool, carpenter was missing; watchman killed; chambermaid saved unhurt; five stewards all killed or missing; two of the cooks killed and one wounded; eight firemen killed or missing; four deck hands killed or missing. All those put down as missing are doubtless dead.

The Byron Sara Ledger says: One of the sufferers was thrown over our office, a distance of about 200 yards, and so mutilated as to be scarcely recognized; and another was hurled through a window into one of our public houses and lodged on a bed fully 100 yards distance from the boat—yet this man survived a few hours; and another was cast about the same distance and fell dead upon the levee.

Heavy masses of iron were hurled in every direction tearing away portions of the roofs and penetrating the walls of houses in the vicinity. The larger portion of one of the boilers fell upon the house occupied by Mr. Thomas, completely sun-dering the roof from comb to eve passing through the lower floor, but fortunately doing no injury to any of the inmates.

REVIEW OF THE SAINT LOUIS MARKETS.

REPUBLICAN OFFICE, }
St. Louis, Oct. 26, 1843. }

Remarks.—We have but a few remarks to offer on the general character of the market, which has undergone some change, produced by the fluctuation in the receipts. The business of the week has been very good, without, however, being heavy; and should the rivers continue open till late in the season, the expectations of our merchants in the amount of business done, will have been realized.

The receipts of nearly all kinds of produce have been liberal—the quantity of bacon here has increased, and the receipts of wheat this week, exceeds that of last, by over 10,000 bushels—what that of tobacco and flour has decreased. Prices of nearly every description of produce have been well sustained. The changes that have been effected, will be found below.

The prospect of St. Louis offering a good market for hogs this fall and coming winter, is very flattering. Several of our merchants and packers of any means, are making extensive preparations for slaughtering and packing, and we think that many inducements will be offered to the farmers of this State and Illinois, to bring their pork to this market. The prospect is favorable for much better prices being paid this fall than the last; but at present what it will be, cannot be determined. One of our most extensive merchants remarked to us yesterday, that he was willing to contract for 5,000 hogs, weighing 200 lbs and over, to be delivered after the first of November, at $2 per 100 pounds.

Flour.—There has been a little more animation in the market this week, but no heavy operations have been made, sales being confined to small lots country brands. Since Monday we have no sales on the wharf at $3 50, 3 56 and 3 62, at which figures the market closed to day. Small lots have been sold from stores to the bakers at $3 75. We have heard of no sales City Mills. The receipts have been very light. The demand is limited, and full receipts would render the market heavy at $3 50.

What.—There is no foreign demand, and the millers want only prime quality. We quote sales of prime lots at 60 a 62 cents, and a few superior lots at 64 a 65 cent, the first figures governing the market. Inferior descriptions range from 37 to 56 cents, according to quality.

Corn.—The demand for shipment has entirely ceased, and the price has declined to 20 cents without sacks, and 22 a 23 cents sack included, for yellow corn, and in but very moderate demand. The millers are paying for good lots of white 24 a 25 cents.

Oats.—Sales are made from waggon at 16 a 18 cents. We have noticed no sales on the wharf this week. There is no demand for more than is sufficient to supply the city, which is very well supplied.

But and Pork.—No sales.

Bacon.—The receipts have been quite heavy this week, and there has been a good deal sold. We quote sales of Sides at from 22 to 34 cents, according to quality and order; and the last day or two the market has been somewhat depressed. Shoulders are in fair demand at 24 and 24 1/2, and Hams command from 4 to 6 cents, according to quality. There has been a large amount shipped this week—principally sides.

Lard.—Strictly prime is in demand at 5 to 5 1/2 cents, and inferior is in fair request at 3 1/2 a 4 c. Very little has been received this week.

Tallow.—This article is in good demand. We heard of a sale yesterday at 5 1/2 cts. The market is firm at from 5 to 6 cts.

Butter.—Fresh butter is scarce, and will command 10 to 12 cents in kegs or firkins. Salt butter we quote at from 6 to 8 cents, as in quality.

Beans.—White beans are in fair request at 75 cents. Colored we quote at 62 a 65 cents per bushel.

Barley.—Sales have been made this week of prime parcels at 37 to 40 cents, and inferior is very dull at 30 a 35 cents. The market is well supplied.

Rye.—There is very little inquiry in the market, and we have heard of no sales this week. We noticed a lot in market to-day, for which 35 cents was the best offer made.

Hemp.—The only sale of any magnitude this week, was that of 168 bales superior dew rotted on Monday, at $3 50. There is a good demand and large lots in good order, will readily command our quotations. Inferior lots we quote at 2 a 2 1/2 cts. There has been a few small lots water rot received, but we have heard of no sale—nominal price $4 to 5 50, as in quality and order. A great part of the receipts was consigned to shippers, and has been sent forward.

Onions.—They are in fair request at 6 1/2 cts per bushel.

Potatoes.—We have seen none sold, except at retail, this week, but continue to quote them at 25 a 31 cts, per bushel.

Dried Apple is in some little demand at 50 and 62 1/2 cents per bushel.

NEW GOODS, VERY CHEAP.

PRATT & SNOW, corner of Young and Wells Streets, one block north of the Temple, Nauvoo, have just received from Boston the largest supply of Dry Goods ever opened in this city, consisting principally of good staple articles for fall and winter; such as Broad-cloths, Cashmere, Satinets, Flannels, Shirtings, Sheetings, Calicoes, Boots, Shoes, &c. &c.

Cash wanted, and country produce bought and sold.

As we intend selling goods very cheap, and on the principles of honor, justice, and impartiality, no one need ask for credit, nor waste breath in bantering on the price, as we have but one invariable price either for cash or barter.

Sud Accident.—The wife of a Mr. John Bulger, a citizen of Marengo, Ala., in drawing water from a cistern became dizzy, and fell into it, the water being seven feet deep. Every effort was made to rescue her, but in vain. As a last resort her husband was let down by a rope, who succeeded in grasping the body of his wife, but while their neighbors were raising them the rope broke, and both were drowned. They left an only child about eight months old.

A Capital story is told by the Cleveland Herald, of Judge Tappan, one of the senators in Congress, who is unfortunately cross-eyed. A number of years ago he was judge of a newly organized county court in the eastern part of that state.

In these days of primitive simplicity or perhaps poverty, the bar-room of a tavern was used as a court-room, and the stable as a jail. One day during the session of the court, the judge had occasion to severely reprimand two of the lawyers, who were wrangling. An odd looking old customer, who sat in one corner, listening apparently with great satisfaction to the reproof, and presuming on old acquaintance and the judge's well known good humor, sang out: "Give it to 'em, old gimblet eyes!" "Who was that?" inquired the judge. "It was this old hoss," answered the chap, raising himself up. "Sheriff," observed the judge, with great gravity, "take that old hoss and put him in the stable."

We see it stated in the Baltimore and some of the Philadelphia papers, that the potato crop in the neighborhood of these cities is almost worthless. In some places the farmers had ceased from digging them, the worms in August and September having caused them to rot in the hill to such an extent that they were not worth digging.

Ma, said a juvenile grammarian of the feminine gender yesterday, when returned from one of the public schools—Ma, mayn't I take some of the currant jelly on the sideboard?

No, said the mother sternly.

Well then, ma, mayn't I take some of the ice cream?

No, again replied ma.

It was not long, however, before the young miss was found digging into both.

Did I not tell you, said the maternal parent, in a somewhat angry tone, not to touch them?

You said no twice, ma, said the precocious girl, and the schoolmistress says that two negatives are equal to an affirmative; so I thought you meant that I should eat them.

The mother sat down upon the sofa and said that the talent some people's children had for learning was astonishing!

SMUTTY WHEAT.

It is a fact not to be disputed, that a very large portion of the wheat grown in the United States in the present year, contains more or less smut. We notice complaints of it from every quarter, and almost every state, and in many cases the quantity present will be a serious drawback on the value of the crop. To what is this general prevalence of the smut to be attributed? Not many have been favorable to the crop during the present season, for all are aware that the quantity of the wheat grown was never better; but in the midst of this beautiful wheat, the dark green upright ears of smut, some lower and some higher, were generally to be found, the very same plump as that of the pure wheat, round, nasty, black, sure to injure it for seed, or spoil flour, if ground in mills not furnished with the best apparatus for cleaning.

Two probable causes only can be assigned, and of these both may have been active, or more or less co-operated to produce such a result. One cause is, surely, the unfavorable state of the weather during the month of September, or the time in which the wheat crop of this country is usually put in. From the 6th to the 20th, there was a scarcely a day in which some rain did not fall, and those who took advantage of the best days to sow, were obliged to do so on ground unfit for the reception of seed, while those who were from the condition of their fields obliged to wait, sowed too late, and in most cases on soils still too wet for healthy germination and vegetation. The unfavorable condition of soils generally at the time of sowing, and the lateness of putting in seed generally, cannot be denied; but we think the prevailing of so large a portion of the plants during the winter, rather than the smut, the result of this late or unfavorable sowing; as we have seen smut in abundance from fields sown early, and while the soil was in first rate order.

The other cause to which we have alluded as the cause of the increase of smut, is the decrease of the practice of liming wheat before sowing. 30 years since, smut in wheat was one of the greatest evils the farmer had to encounter. The practice of sowing or washing seed wheat in brine, was discovered and generally adopted, and in a few years smutty wheat nearly ceased to be known. Many farmers, it is true, were too lazy or careless to lime their wheat, but such frequently purchased their seeds from those who had grown it pure by that treatment, and for many years it was rare to find a load of smutty wheat sent to market. The danger apparently past, the practice of liming and liming has gradually fallen into disuse, even with good farmers, and the natural result has been, that smut in the wheat crop is again rapidly on the increase, and threatens to become as injurious as ever, unless preventive measures promptly resorted to, such as were formerly so effective. That smut is infectious, or can be communicated from one seed to pure grain, is a fact as well established as that the itch or small pox may be spread by contact or inoculation; and every measure intended to guard against it, should be based on a knowledge of these facts. Peculiar conditions of the soil, or of the weather, may be more favorable to the action of these injurious causes than others, but no matter what the weather or soil may be, the farmer who sows smutty wheat, without "precautionary measures, must not be disappointed at finding it in increased quantities in his next crop. The concurrent testimony of wheat purchasers and millers, that smutty wheat has been gradually on the increase for several years, should put farmers on the alert, and induce a general recurrence to some measures for arresting the evil; and when the evil is one that may be so easily and quickly removed, there can be no excuse for permitting its continuance. —[Cultivator.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

CAMPBELL LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, Insults and nervous affections generally, Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after disipation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.
This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

POETRY.

From the Knickerbocker. THE PRINTER.

The printer, in his folio, heralds the world
Now come tidings of weddings, makings, mummings, entertainments, jubilees, wars, fires, inundations, thefts, murders, massacres, mete-ors, comets, specters, prodigies, shipwrecks, piracies, sea-fights, lais-zus, pleas, proclamations, embassies, trophies, triumphs, revels, sports, plays—then again, as if a new shifted scene, treasons, cheating, tricks, robberies, enormous villainies of all kinds, funerals, burials, new discoveries, expeditions—now comical, then tragical matters. To-day we hear of new offices created, to-morrow of great men deposed, and then again of fresh honors conferred: one is let loose, another imprisoned—one purchased, another broken—she thrives, his neighbor turns bankrupt—now plenty, then again death and famine—one runs, another rides, wrestles, laughs, weeps, and so forth. Thus do we daily hear such like, both public and private news!

He stood there alone at that shadowy hour,
By the evening lamp dimly burning—
All silent within, save the ticking type,
All without, save the night watch turning:
And heavily ebb'd the solemn sound,
As slowly he paced o'er the frozen ground.

And dark were the mansions so lately that shone,
With the joy of festivity gleaming,
And hearts that were beating in sympathy then.
Were now living it o'er in their dreaming.
Yet the printer sat at his lonely post,
As slowly he gathered his mighty host.

And there lay the merchant all pillowed in down,
And building bright hopes of the morrow,
Nor dreamed he that fate was then waving a wand
That would bring to him fear and sorrow:
Yet the printer was there in his shadowy room,
And he sat in his frame work that rich man's doom!

The young wife was sleeping, whom lately had
The tins that death only can sever:
And dreaming she started, yet woke with a smile,
For she thought they were parted forever!
But the printer was clicking the type that would tell
On the morrow the return of that midnight spell!

And there lay the statesman, whose feverish brow
And restle'd the pillow was pressing,
For he felt through the shadowy mist of his dream
His fleetest hopes now possessing:
Yet the printer worked on, mid silence and gloom,
And dug for ambition its lowliest tomb.

And slowly to the woman went gathering up
His budget of grief and of gladness—
A wreath for the noble, a grave for the low,
For the happy, a cup full of sadness—
Strange stories of wonder, to enchant the ear,
And dark tones of fear, to excite with fear.

Full strange are the tales that dark host shall hear
To palace and cot on the morrow,
Oh welcome, thrice welcome, to many a heart!
To many a harp of sorrow—
It shall go like the wind and wandering air,
For life and its changes are impressed there.

Agricultural.

[From the Michigan Farmer.]

TO AGRICULTURISTS:
In this number we will examine the constitution of different kinds of soils, and tell why the one is productive and the other barren.

Analysis of a very fertile soil:
Silica with fine siliceous sand, 87.643
Alumina, 5.666
Peroxide and protoxide of iron, 2.220
Peroxide of manganese, 0.360
Lime, 0.564
Magnesia, 0.302
Potash combined with Silica, 0.130
Soda, 0.025
Phosphoric acid, 10.060
Sulphuric acid, 0.027
Chlorine, 0.035
Humus, soluble in alkalies, 1.204
Humus, 1.072
Carbonic acid combined with lime, 0.080
Nitrogenous organic matter, 1.011
This soil is fertile because it contains insoluble quantities of such inorganic matters as are found in most plants, and which are indispensable to their growth.
—and Alumina and Humus, mixed with Silica in such proportions as to make it sufficiently retentive of moisture.
The following is the analysis of a bar-ren soil. 100 parts by weight contain Silica & siliceous sand, 62.216
Alumina, 0.266

Peroxide of iron,	0.942
Peroxide of manganese,	0.364
Peroxide of iron,	trace
Lime in combination with silica,	1.633
Magnesia in combination with silica,	0.086
Potash principally in comb. with silica,	0.038
Soda,	trace
Phosphoric acid,	trace
Sulphuric acid,	0.051
Chlorine,	trace
Humus soluble in alkaline carbonates,	2.084
Humus,	1.200
Humus matter,	0.420

The sterility of this soil is owing to its small quantities of Phosphoric Acid, Alumina, and Potash. When a compost containing the proper portions of these matters was added, it became very productive.

Analysis of land in Ohio, remarkable for its great fertility. 100 parts by weight contain Silica and fine siliceous sand, 79.338
Alumina, 7.306
Peroxide and protoxide of iron, 5.894
much magnetic iron sand, 1.320
Peroxide of manganese, 0.619
Lime, 0.124
Potash principally combined with silica, 0.200
Soda, 0.014
Phosphoric acid, 1.776
Sulphuric acid combined with lime, 0.122
Chlorine, 0.036
Humus soluble in alkalies, 1.950
Nitrogenous organic matter, 0.025

By comparing the analysis with the last,
it will be perceived that it contains a much larger proportion of Alumina, Lime, Potash, and Phosphoric Acid—which is the cause of its fertility. The Alumina acts by retaining moisture in the soil, and the other matters by constituting the inorganic parts of plants.

Some soils are rendered sterile by too large a quantity of Lime, Potash, Alumi-na, peroxide and protoxide of iron, &c.— Too large or too small a proportion of these matters will produce sterility. If too much, this causes a much more difficult to remove than if too small. For agricultural purposes it would not be practicable to remove such matters, when mixed with the earth, but sometimes it might be to neutralize them by some chemical agent. For instance, if too much potash, it might be neutralized by Nitric acid, and if Lime, by Sulphuric acid; but if inorganic substances are wanting, they generally may be easily supplied.

No land can be productive, except it contain such inorganic matters as are found in the ashes of such plants as we wish to grow thereupon.

CORN-STALK MOLASSES.

Before us is a beautiful and very tasty sample of molasses from the corn-stalk.
It far exceeds what we had believed or anticipated relative to the article, although we had formed and expressed a very favorable opinion upon the subject. But we now have something besides the "papers in evidence"—for here is the genuine, which we have examined and tested, (or tasted,) with eye and palate, to our entire satisfaction. In flavor, beauty and density, we think the sample before us is superior to any cane molasses we have ever seen in this State. Several of our mercantile and other friends, have viewed and tasted it, and express a similar opinion.

This molasses was manufactured by Mr. David Kennedy, of Grass Lake, Jackson county. We are informed that he has, this season, made about fifty gallons of molasses, and some sugar.

We hope that Mr. Kennedy, will give us the result of his experiment—the mode of manufacture, &c.—for publication.—
Others also, in this State, who have engaged in the business of making sugar from the corn-stalk, are requested to favor us with such information upon the subject as they may have derived from their experience.—Michigan Farmer.

HARVESTING CORN.

Mr. Editor.—An article in your last paper, taken from the New England Farmer, recommends cutting up corn when the earliest ears are well glazed, whilst the other ears are in a good condition for boiling or roasting. I had occasion to cut up some of my corn, next to where I wanted to plow, two years ago; it being in the same state of forwardness as described by the New England Farmer.—
The balance I let stand until it got ripe; and of the last I cut up, one stock was worth two of that which I cut up, first.
The first that I cut up was very badly shrunken and very light—the other was sound and good.

In relation to topping corn. I had occasion to top some of mine to feed my cows, when putting in wheat this fall.—
The remainder I cut up by the roots, after it got ripe. On picking that which had been topped, I found it badly shrunken and shriveled. I had supposed that my corn was as sound this year as any I had raised since I came into this country;
this led me to examine that which was cut up, and I found it to be sound and good. Judge Buell's reasoning upon this subject, (as given in your last paper,) I think is correct.

M. W. NORTH EAST.

Jackson, Co., Oct. 10, 1843.

CURIOUS HORTICULTURAL FACT.—Third crop Apples.—The following is an extract of a letter received at the office of the Philadelphia Farmer, from Partismouth Ohio. The apples sent, were exhibited deservedly as a curiosity:

"My June apples were ripe on the first of June, and in blossom for a second crop which ripened the last of July, with blossoms for a third crop which ripened the last week in September—at which time the tree was in blossom for the fourth time—the fruit was blighted by the frost when the apples were of the size of a robbin's egg. A few bunches of blossoms were observed on the tree in the beginning of November. An opportunity offering, I sent you three apples—the bottle being small I had necessarily to send you small apples—but they will serve as specimens of a great natural curiosity. My June apple tree, which blossomed five times last year, and yielded ripe fruit three times, is again covered with blossoms thicker than over this spring."

SEASONABLE HINTS.

Fall and Winter Ploughing.—As occasion may offer through the fall and winter, plough up your stiff clayey grounds, which may be destined for spring crops. But be sure never to plough when the land is wet, as when turned up in a state of mortar it will so remain during the ensuing season, and probably will receive no benefit from the breaking down influence of freezing and thawing. If you desire to derive the melioration contemplated, your ground must be in good condition when ploughed: Besides the improvement of texture in the soil derived by fall and winter ploughing, much time, which is always precious in the spring, may be thereby gained at that season of business, but even this latter advantage will be lost to the farmer, or planter, unless he see that his ground is in proper condition when ploughed.—P. Advocate.

Fattening Hogs.—We would here remark, that the putting up hogs for fattening, should not be delayed until cold weather, as they gain fat much faster under the influence of heat than cold.—
When confined in their pens, they should have allowances of charcoal, rotten wood, ashes, and salt, given them every few days; be provided with fresh water at least twice a day, and supplied liberally with such materials as mould and leaves from the woods, marsh mud, the scrapings of the road and yards, corn stalks, refuse straw and offal of every kind, to be converted by them into manure. Besides their regular feeds of corn, it would be well, every few days, to give them vegetables of some kind.—P. Advocate.

Sheep.—If you have not already provided your sheep with covered folds, have such conveniences forthwith erected, so that they may be in readiness for their reception when the time arrives for them to need shelter. And be sure to cover the floor of it with a good bed of leaves and mould, and through the winter to add, weekly, at least, litter of some kind, so as to keep the sheep both clean and dry. Such attention is alike promotive of health and the increase of fleece.—P.
Advocate.

Buckwheat.—This grain should be cut before the frost overtakes it. If would probably be a safe rule to cut when about one half the grain in the head has ripened.
Be sure to save the straw, as it makes excellent provender for cattle, and should be an object with husbandmen to waste nothing which can be converted into animal food.—P. Advocate.

Young Stock of all kinds.—These should be attended to now, and as the pasture will soon become scant, additional food must be provided them, so as to prevent their falling off, in order that they may be brought into winter quarters in good condition.

Drainage.—There is, perhaps, no better time to go forward with the construction of drains and ditches than the present; and as wet soils are unfriendly to good and cleanly culture, we advise that all such lands be laid dry.—Adv.

Roots of all kinds.—Have these taken up before any injury shall be done to them by the frost, and as taken up have them safely put away without delay or exposure.

Stables, Barns, Corn Crib, Granaries,
Hens Houses, and all other out buildings, should be thoroughly cleaned and white-washed.

Orchards.—Examine these and give the trees a painting of 4-5ths of soft soap and 1-5th flour of sulphur, well mixed together.

Working Stock of all kinds.—These should now receive additional care; be housed of a night, well fed and cleaned, and provided with ample bedding.

From the Indian Country.—The Arkansas Intelligencer of the 23d ult. brings us accounts of horrible outrages perpetrated in the Cherokee Nation. The following is the statement in that paper:

"On the night of the 15th Mr. Benjamin Vore, his wife, and a traveller, citizens of the United States, were murdered at the residence of Mr. Vore upon the military road, in the Cherokee nation, and the house burned to the ground. Mr.
Vore was a licensed trader in the nation,
and we suppose some desperate men, taking advantage of the unsettled state of society in that country, perpetrated the act for plunder; they murdered all living witnesses, and endeavored to destroy all traces, that might lead to a discovery of the dreadful deed."

"The traveler is supposed to be a Mr.
Stevens, a carpenter, who was expected at Fort Smith about this time. Mrs. Vore was killed a short distance from the house, and her corpse was dragged to the house and destroyed in the conflagration; but the remains of all three of the victims were found in the cinders next morning."

Three men, named Thomas Starr, Pearl Starr and Ellis Starr, are suspected of having perpetrated the murder, and writs have been issued for their apprehension. A letter from the vicinity states that they had been once arrested and avowed their willingness to be tried, but afterwards escaped into the mountains. The trial of Jacob and John West and of Ogeesee for the murder of Bushyhead was to come on soon, and difficulties from his friends were apprehended.
The Intelligencer says:—

"A private letter informs us that peace prevails in the Cherokee nation; that habits of civilization and religion are prevailing among the people; that the crops are good and the people happy and contented."

A rumor has reached us of a considerable fight that took place between the Shawnees and Cumanches, high up on the Brazos, in which the Cumanches lost some thirty or forty slain, and about 200 head of horses. This rumor may be true, for this predatory warfare has been going on for many years. The Shawnees and Delawares are the greatest warriors on this continent."

Astronomical Coincidences and Differences.—It is a curious coincidence that among the Algonquins of the Atlantic and of the Mississippi, alike among the Nara-gansetts and the Illinois, the North Star was called the Bear. This accidental agreement with the widely-spread usage of the old world is far more observable than the imaginary resemblance between the signs of the Mexicans for their days, and the signs on the zodiac for the month in Tibet. The American nation had no zodiac, and could not, therefore, for the names of its days have borrowed from central Asia the symbols that marked the path of the sun through the year. Nor had the Mexicans either weeks or lunar months; but, after the manner of barbarous nations, they divided the days in the year into eighteen scores, leaving the few remaining days to be set apart by themselves. This division may have sprung directly from their system of enumeration; it need not have been imported.
It is a greater marvel that the Indigenous inhabitants of Mexico had a nearly exact knowledge of the length of the year, and, at the end of one hundred and four years, made their intercalation more accurately than the Greeks, the Romans, or the Egyptians. The length of their tropical year was almost identical with the result obtained by the astronomers of the Caliph Almahomd—but let no one derive this coincidence from intercourse, unless he is prepared to believe that, in the ninth century of our era, there was commerce between Mexico and Bagdad, or an now advertised says Luther in his "Table Talk," that a new astrologer is risen, who presumes to prove that the earth moveth and goeth about, not the firmament, the sun, and moon, not the stars: like as when one sitteth in a coach or in a ship that is moved, thinketh he sitteth still and resteth, but the earth and trees do run and move themselves. Thus it goeth when we give up ourselves to our own foolish fancies and conceits.
This fool (Copernicus) will turn the whole art of astronomy upside down; but the Scripture sheweth and teacheth another lesson, when Joshua commanded the sun to stand still and not the earth.—Colburn's Magazine.

Modes of Salutation.—Greenlanders have none, and laugh at the idea of one person being inferior to another. Islanders, near the Philippines, take a person's hand or foot and rub it over their face.
Laplanders apply their noses strongly against the person they salute. In New Guinea they place leaves upon the head of those they salute. In the Straits of the Sound they raise the left foot of the person saluted, pass it gently over the right leg and thence over the face. The inhabitants of the Philippines bend very low, placing their hands on their cheeks, and raise one foot in the air, with the knee bent. An Ethiopian takes the robe of another, and ties it about him; so as to leave his friend almost naked. The Japanese take off a slipper, and the people of Arracan their sandals, in the street, and their stockings, in the house, when they salute. The negro kings on the coast of Africa salute by snapping the middle finger three times. The inhabitants of Carthage, when they would show a particular attachment, open a vein, and present the blood to their friend as a beverage. If the Chinese meet, after a long separation, they fall on their knees, bend their faces to the earth two or three times, and use many other affected modes.

They have, also, a kind of ritual, or academy of compliments, by which they regulate the number of bows, genuflec-tions, and words to be spoken on any occasion. Ambassadors practice these ceremonies forty days before they appear at court. In China they rub their noses together. The Dutch, who are considered as great eaters, have a morning salutation among all ranks, "Simankolykeeten?" "May you eat a hearty dinner?" Another is, "Hoe vaart a wel?"
"How do you sail?" adopted, no doubt, in the early periods of the republic, when they were all great navigators and fishermen. The usual salutation at Cairo is,
"How do you sweat?" a dry hot skin being a sure indication of a destructive ephemeral fever. Some authors have observed, in contrasting the haughty spaniard with the frivolous Frenchman, that the proud, steady gait and inflexible solemnity of the former were depressed in his mode of salutation, "Come cite?" "How do you stand?" "Comment vous portez vous?"
"How do you carry yourself?" was equally expressive of the gay motion and uncertain action of the latter. The common salutation in the southern provinces of China amongst the lower classes is,
"Xafaw" "Have you eaten your rice?"

Marriage in the street.—We learn from the Missouri Courier that on the 20th ult. Squire J. F. Mahan linked Miss Eliza Little to Mr. Nelson Aubrey, in one of the streets in Palmyra. The circumstances are a little romantic. It seems two families were travelling westward in company, with one of which was the fair lady, with the other the loving swain, who had concluded to marry.
The old folks had refused consent. They thus travelled on until the families with their wagons parted, each taking a different road, when the lady contrived to escape from her parents' wagon and follow that of her lover. On reaching town, they jumped out of their wagon, called for the Squire, hitched trunks, and drove on "their way rejoicing." The opposition of her parents had nearly driven the young lady to a state of desperation, so her lover drove her to the State of Illinois.

Shocking Case.—A case involving circumstances of extreme misery was tried at the Wilshire (England) assizes lately.
One Litton was put to the bar, charged with murdering his own child. The prisoner was a labouring man, and for want of employment was obliged to go into the Union work-house, but soon come out again and returned with his family to his former cot. Thence he was ejected, and borrowing some hurdles and some straw, raised a kind of shelter by the roadside. He obtained a little work, but was warned by the police that his habitation was an obstruction to the road. In despair, the wretched man fired the whole, and his three little ones were burnt to a cinder. One poor thing hid his skull fractured, and hence the prosecution.
The jury acquitted the prisoner.

Good.—A lady of our acquaintance, says the Louisville Daily, not long since sent her servant to a friend to borrow a cent of the apothecary. The boy shirky returned without it, and said to his mistress. She says she has't any ma'am.

"What did you ask for, John?"
"I asked her if she had any sweet potatoes ma'am."

The consumption of coffee in the U.
States in 1811, was 109,200,247 lbs., for a population of 17,000,000; in the United Kingdom the consumption was 23,421,166 lbs., for a population of 20,000,000, being an average consumption of one pound per head in England and six pounds per head in the U. States.

A Volcanic Eruption.—Another great eruption has recently taken place from the crater of Mount Vesuvius, exhibiting a beautiful appearance, and almost turning night into day at Naples.

Persian Opinion of English Horaceomen.—When the Indian mission was journeying through Persia, several of the serjeants' wives travelled on horseback in the usual riding dress of English women. They created no little wonder and speculation. As women in Persia travel close veiled, it seemed clear to the natives that these beardless folk were boys; and as both male and female ride there astradle, the astonishment was extremely finding no leg on the off side. After star-gling awhile, the children would run round the near side to see, how matters stood there and finding only one broad leg covering, would scamper, agape, into their houses, shouting, "O! mammy, mammy, come and look at the boys with one leg!"

—Abbot's Journey to Khiva, &c.

WALEES.

The impunity with which the Rebeccaes have carried on their war against the tollgates in the south of Wales, has caused dissatisfaction to spread through the northern provinces; and the people are evidently awaking to the wrongs and oppressions which they have patiently endured for centuries. In proportion to their success, the Rebeccaes become daring, and we are sorry to say it, more vindictive. The Monmouth Merlin says
—"The Rebeccaes have disgracefully lost whatever of prestige was attached to their cause; they have committed incendianism and murder! Cowardly miscreants have hung a torch among the fruits of harvest, and have embued their hands in the blood of an aged woman! Is this the war whose 'romantic character' challenges the sympathies of high-minded Welshmen? The glory of the 'Cambrian William Tell' and his gallant mountaineers has departed; they have become Swings and ruthless assassins."

ITALY.

Bologna continued to be agitated by accounts of the movements of the insurgents who, it appeared, were collecting in guerrilla parties in the mountains.—
Count Radetzky, the military governor of the Lombardo Venetian kingdom, has received authority to place at the disposal of the sovereigns of Italy 4,000 men in case of need, and to march them on the threatened points.

The Augsburg Gazette of the 13th inst.
says that the most contradictory reports are circulated, relative to the late insurrection at Bologna. It is rumored that the insurgents are still in such force in the mountains in the direction of Pistoia and De Bagni Della Porretta, that it will require the intervention of a foreign force to dislodge them. In the meantime the Papal government had sent all their disposable troops against the insurgents.

The Toulonnais of the 14th inst. quotes a letter from Naples of the 25th ult. mentioning that symptoms of disorder were beginning to manifest themselves in that capital. Attempts had again been made to set on fire the clothes of ladies of rank in the streets of Naples. Several arrests had taken place. According to a decree of the police, every individual caught in the act was to be bastinadoed, and afterwards tried by a criminal court. The Neapolitan government was afraid to call in regiments from the provinces, where it appears, considerable excitement prevailed; but orders had been sent to the four Swiss regiments to repair thither for the festivity of the Madonna de Pio di Grota, when an outbreak was apprehended.

ALGIERS.

The accounts from Algiers are of a more peaceable character, and the Regency was beginning to enjoy a degree of tranquillity. The military convoys between Oran, Mascara and Tlemcen, now circulate freely, under the escort of friendly Arabs. General Lamoriciere was still in the field, and to his operations was the tranquillity of the interior to be ascribed.

There are now in France, says one of the journals, 6,679 advocates or barristers, 3,563 avoues or attorneys, 10,300 notaries, 8,206 huissiers or summoning officers, and about 20,000 agents; making a total of 43,754 persons, all living by law and justice.

The following remarkably cool announcement appeared in a Paris paper
the other day:—"A widow, a foreigner, thirty years of age, and very rich, wishes to marry. Address (postage paid) Madame P., Rue St. Honore, No.
400."

Fences.—Examine all your fences, gates and barns, and have all necessary repairs made.

When you have attended to every thing we have pointed out, and such others as your own superior judgment may have suggested, from a firm and unchangeable resolution to make more manure the present fall, approaching winter, and ensuing spring, than you have ever done before. Bring your mind to reason thus:
"If I don't feed my land it will not feed me." Whenever you shall have got your mind into this belief, and to assume the determination to act up to it, you may rest assured, that your land will be on the highway to improvement.

Pumpkins.—These should be gathered and put away in a dry place before the frost sets in, as they always keep best when thus attended to.

Garter.—King Otto has been forced at last,
to give his subjects a constitution and ministerial responsibility.

IRISH REPEAL PLAN OF MR. O'CONNELL.

We make the following extract from the London correspondence of the Journal of Commerce, a paper hostile to the Irish Repeal, it is dated London September 8th, 1843.

"It is a dangerous experiment, when your house is on fire, to look calmly on, with arms and fondled hope, expecting the flames to go out by themselves. Yet such is the precise condition of the minister in his department towards Ireland. Nothing has been done to stop the agitation for the repeal of the union between Great Britain and Ireland, either in the shape of kindness or coercion; and the consequence is, that movement is spreading, and Daniel is more powerful than ever. I cannot say how long I am to repeat this language, but the government, as yet, have given no indication of a change of policy. Whether the do-nothing system is to be pursued, up to the meeting of the next session of Parliament, it is impossible to conjecture: though if such be the fact, Sir Robert Peel will have nothing to do but to advise her Majesty to issue writs for convening the Parliament of Ireland."

By December, Mr. O'Connell declares that he will have his three hundred gentlemen in Dublin, 'The Preservative Association,' as the body are to be termed, and they shall meet without dread of trenching upon the provisions of the atrocious Convention act. That measure was passed in 1793, by the Irish Parliament, and is very short, but to the point. It will be somewhat difficult for the Liberator to frame his plan for the meeting of the Council of Three Hundred without infringing the principle of the bill, and so he seems to think and feel, for at all his recent monster meetings he has repeated the declaration that he is much absorbed, in private with the details of this gigantic scheme. In a letter which he has addressed to a distinguished Catholic Rector, of Macroom, Father Lee, he says: 'You perceive the difficulty of every arrangement. I have to conciliate enemies, or at least do every thing that ought to conciliate them. I have to satisfy the honest judgment of honest friends. In short, the working out of both plans—that of forming a due constituency, to be ready to act immediately after the Repeal; and that of forming a separate association—the Preservative Association—to assist in carrying triumphantly the Repeal.' 'I am detained by national business of the very first importance. I am consoled by the conviction that the Repeal of the accursed union is no longer doubtful, and can not be remote. This letter has been considered an important document, I therefore give you its principal contents. There is evidently nothing of the white feather in it, though it evinces a great deal of caution and wisdom."

At the Longhara meeting on the 21st inst., Mr. O'Connell was much more distant and treasonable in his language than he has ever been. 'Let England!' he observed, 'be involved in any awkward dilemma with one of the States of Europe—let any other country on the face of the earth attack her, and in twenty-four hours they would have their own parliament.' For words not one tithe so objectionable, daring and dangerous, the Whigs indicted O'Connell, to which indictment he pleaded guilty upon demurrer, and subsequently vanquished the government on a point of law, thereby quashing the whole proceedings. There is such a prestige in his favor of never having been defeated, but always the victor against the authorities, that his character has acquired a kind of invincibility. The people of Ireland cling to and cherish this feeling, and among the millions of his devotees, to doubt his success is only to question his existence. It is this remarkable, most extraordinary elevation, that the government ought to have destroyed, and there refusal to do so can only be attributed to rank fear of themselves, or real dread of their adversary. It seems to be the opinion of the Liberator, and as you perceive by the last quotation, his tone has become bolder, and his defiance to the Saxons more hostile, determined, and contemptuous than on any previous occasion."

The reply, just put forth, to the Queen's speech by Mr. O'Connell, is a long, able and conclusive document, as to the merits of the question, and the list of those real grievances, for the redress of which the majority of the Irish people are at issue with their rulers. The great portion of the English people are quite indifferent to the subject, but in the event of any very strong measures being adopted by the government, they will take part with the Liberator, not for newly created love of his cause, but from their antipathy to the government of the day, they inherit Toryism, and growing detestation of oppression. It is this feeling which makes Peel pause, and compels even Wellington to waver."

THE DEATH-BED OF NAPOLEON.

The wind and foaming wave
Broke on the island strand,
Where a monarch found a living grave
With a tried yet broken band.
And the ocean winds were high,
And the tempest walked abroad.
When the eagle's cry was called to die—
That soul restored to God.

No woman's form was there,
An angel mid the gloom,
But war-worn man, in stern despair,
Watched in the midnight room.
Those eyes which proud yulood
On strife and hostile spears
And shame and insult never brooked,
Were now all dim with tears.

But he for whom they wept—
Their crownless Emperor—
His spirit still its vigils kept
On the purple tide of war.
Far from that dying bed,
From the very least heart and limb,
And the torches burning dim.

Far from the women's sobs,
The tale on the lonely seas,
That spirit fled on its eagle wings,
As a bird on the morning breeze.
As he seemed in death to stand
As on many a glorious day,
With folded arms and high command,
Once more 'a l'et d'armee.'

He heard the cannon's roar—
'Twas but the thundering sea;
And the trumpet pealed on his ear once more—
'Twas the tempest sweeping free,
And the crash of armies meeting,
And the wale of the crushed and dying—
'Twas but the surf on the white sands boat
And the eagle's scream in flight.

The light of that glorious dream
Played on those features wan, Lighted the aspect pale and dim
Of the fallen and dying man.
And from those pale lips came
Those words of haughty sway,
That woke a nation's soul to flame,
When he stood 'a l'et d'armee.'

The tempest's wrath was done,
And the eagle sought her nest,
And the waves lay calm in the morning sun
As if stars had kissed their nest.

The soul had passed away,
On the wings of the rushing storm—
And the sun lit its first rejoicing ray Gleamed on a marble form.

Yet didn't see a ill, and full
Of a fixed and solemn might
Where the features were and beautiful
And the forehead broad and white:
And the dream of that dying heart,
Still like a glory may
On the face of the exiled Bonaparte,
No more 'a l'et d'armee.'

WOOD! WOOD!!

WE would respectfully notify those who have promised us wood, that we are in want of it; and if they are as willing to fulfill as they were to make promises, we shall be supplied with an abundance of this indispensable article soon.

Persons wishing to become subscribers to the Times and Seasons, or Neighbor, can now have the opportunity of doing so by leaving their names at our office, and forwarding the amount in wood.

TAYLOR & WOODRUFF.

A company of emigrants arrived here last Saturday, all in good health and spirits, from England. Mormonism still continues to increase in that country. After the large amount of emigration to this place, the church numbers from eight to twelve thousand; and it is still on the increase.

From the accounts that our friends bring from the old country, the state of affairs there is at a very low ebb, poverty and distress are stalking forth with rapid strides, and the situation of the working classes is becoming every day more and more deplorable.

Mr. Ryan, one of the commissioners who was appointed to negotiate for the canal loan, has arrived at Boston and is probably by this time in Illinois. A private letter, written by himself, which we have seen published in the Chicago Democrat, states that they have completed their loan, and that accompanied by an agent of the bond holders, he expects soon to be in Illinois.

False Coin.—Half cents are in circulation silvered over so as to resemble a quarter of a dollar.

OLD AGE.

Socrates learned to play on musical instruments in his old age; Cato, at eighty, learned Greek; Plutarch, at about the same age, studied Latin, and Franklin learned to speak French towards the close of life.

DIED.—On the 3d inst., in this city, Mrs. Leah Chiles, of cancer and rheumatism, in the 57th year of her age.

Sister Chiles was a firm believer in the doctrine of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, as they have been revealed in the last days to man, through the medium of revelation. She shared in all the persecutions heaped upon the saints, and was driven with them from the State of Missouri, and suffered much from exposure and fatigue. Never was the name of a more generous, benevolent and sympathetic woman enrolled upon the records of the church. She was truly a mother in Israel. She possessed great faith which seemed, for a long time, to battle the destroyer, Death; but it was the will of her heavenly Father to take her to himself, that her soul might be emancipated and she released from the vicissitudes of this troublesome world. She had been afflicted for more than a year, and suffered the most excruciating pain; but she was perfectly resigned to the will of heaven and when the period of her dissolution arrived she fell asleep, as calm as the sleep of infancy, with the unwavering hope of participating in the first resurrection, when she should awake to everlasting youth, immortality and eternal life.

Habits of the Salmon.—A good deal of attention having been directed, of late years, to the habits of salmon in the fresh water, in consequence of the curious experiments of Mr. Shaw, in some Sutherlandshire rivers; and having seen and known certain facts bearing on the subject, in the course of my boyish explorations of my native river, I may be permitted shortly to mention what I saw going on under my own eyes. My position was a favorable one; for I have been concealed to a thicket of the bank, on, I think, twenty-one occasions, in different seasons, whilst the proceeding of pairs of breeding fish were distinctly visible, from four to ten yards distant from my high place of concealment. When the place for the gravely bed, or nest of the ova is chosen, both fish set to work to scoop out the sand and gravel, and on those occasions in which the whole scene of the operation were witnessed from the beginning, the female commenced the work. She can be easily known by her matronly size; whilst the male is generally distinguishable by the curious hooked spur projecting upwards from the lower jaw. The female, then, in singular analogy with the hen bird, commences digging into, and excavating the gravel, with her belly and tail; occasionally poking a refractory pebble out of the way with her nose. The male, all the time, keeps watch in the immediate neighborhood of his wife; and although nature has denied him the power of ascending her with a song, after the fashion of the cock bird, he does not the less tenderly guard the privacy of his spouse, but swims round her in a protecting circle, in keep of interlopers. When the lady fish has worked all long enough, which may be half an hour, she rests for a little, and the attentive husband takes her place and goes on with the digging; whilst the female circles round, and watches over him in turn. Indeed, there is no little moral interest excited by these proceedings; and I may add, that the reciprocal courtesy and affection with which this labour of parental providence is carried on by the silent pair is worthy of all imitation by more exalted husbands and wives. With admirable instinct these creatures never select a part of the stream that is likely to dry up. It is essential, I believe, that the bed for the ova should be at the bottom of running water, of moderate depth; not in too strong a current, which during floods would be likely to carry off and destroy the deposit, nor in a stagnant part of the river, where a mud sediment, and the want of water sufficiently aerated, might choke the embryo brood. The bed for the ova is a small trench, four or five feet long, and a foot and a half, or thereabouts, in breadth and depth. Soon after the roe and milt are deposited by the parent fish, they commence simultaneously covering them up with the gravel they had previously excavated with so much toil; and this appeared to be a comparatively easy operation. I noticed that both fish remained in the vicinity of the nest all the day, but were not visible next morning, nor during the next day.—Events of a Military life.

A bachelor's reply to a young lady who significantly sent him as a present some worm-wood:—

BY THEOPHILUS PICTURESQUE.
I'm glad your gift is not a kiss,
Much worse might me have hit!
The worm-wood's bad enough, but worse,
The worm-wood and the girl (1)

Counterfeits.—The Cincinnati Enquirer says that a quantity of counterfeit St. Louis city scrip is in circulation about the mouth of the Ohio, and up the river as far as Louisville. They are the plates which were stolen and are marked on the face with the denomination of the note in red ink. The city never issued bills marked thus. Three men were imprisoned a few days since at Cairo, for passing notes of this description. Our river men should be careful or they may be taken in with some of this convenient currency.

A female to be hung.—Rose Ann Keon, was tried and convicted at Salem, New Jersey, on Friday the 6th ultimo of causing the death of Enos Selby, by poison, and condemned to be hung on the 3d of November. The prisoner is said to be scarcely more than sixteen years of age.

Experience.—We live and learn; but we do not live and remember.—We make but little practical use of the reasonings either of others or ourselves. Our minds vary, but seldom radically improve. Our willingness to be warned by the experience of others is not surprising; but that we should forget, or be blind to our own experience is the most strange.

Some Americans are about establishing a cotton mill on the Chambly River, Canada.

Nauvoo, on the Mississippi river, in North America, is talked of as a very suitable location for factories of various kinds. Speculators, see to it.

The spurious Mexican dollars in circulation in the South and West, are so admirably executed as to pass undetected among business men. They are, however, lighter in weight, and duller in appearance than the true coin. Their value is about 50 cents to the dollar.

A ten-cent piece, gilded by the newly invented process, was passed on a countryman in Philadelphia, the other day, for a quarter eagle. There is all sorts of rascality going on in this world, and it behooves people to keep their "eyes open tight."

Police Organization.—It is proposed to organize the public and private watchmen of New York city, amounting to nearly eight hundred men, into a battalion, which is to be armed and uniformed, taken into pay by the year, and to be on duty night and day.

Bigamist Convicted.—On Wednesday, in the court at Salem, New Jersey, Alexander Novoscoski alias Edward Bronowski, alias Smith, was convicted of bigamy. It was proved upon the trial, that he had at present four wives living. Beware of the dog.

The Mackerel fishery, says the Hingham Gazette, has thus far proved a poor business. Some vessels arrive in port with hardly fish enough to pay the expenses of the trip.

A Fortunate Tar.—An English paper publishes the following item:

"W. Robertson, a veteran sailor, who has braved the ocean for full half a century, unexpectedly came into an fortune last week, by the death of an uncle, amounting to 75,000. This fortunate man lately sailed as a cook in the Ann, Shilly, of Sunderland, which vessel was paid off last week, by Mr. Alexander of Bristol. He is sixty-five years of age; and when asked what he should do with such an immense fortune, he replied, 'I have about forty relatives, all of whom will be glad to get some of it, and I shall take care to secure a snug cottage for myself, in which I may comfortably spend the remainder of my days.'"

The latest case.—A very modest lady, who was passenger on board a packet ship, it is said, sprang out of her berth and jumped overboard, on hearing the captain during a storm order the crew to haul down the sheets.

My young friend, said a minister to a boy at camp meeting, do you think of a future state?

No I never meddles with State affairs, though brother John is a politician.

Do you ever think about dying?

No, but I guess our Sally did when she got the measles, for she turned all sorts of colors.

Whose boy are you?

When any body axes dat tell'em you don't know.

Method of catching Monkeys in the neighborhood of Algiers.—Campbell, in his letters from the South, gives the following account of the method of taking monkeys in Northern Africa. The Kabyle peasant attaches a gourd, well fixed to a tree; he puts some rice in it, and strews some grains at the aperture, to show that there may be more within, making a hole just large enough to admit the paw of the monkey. Unfortunately, pug puts in his own paw and grasps his booty, but is unable to draw it back, because it is clenched, and he is not wise enough to think of unclenching it. Hence he remains, as the law phrases it, with 'his person attached,' and is found next morning, looking, you may suppose, very foolish and penitent. The olden custom was to put him instantly to death; but, as he will now fetch twenty francs at Algiers he is sentenced only to transportation, so that the monkeys are at least one part of the population who have been benefitted by the arrival of the French.

Wearn that a Botanist from England, was in the late company of Sir Wm. Stewart to the mountains. It is said that he has made large collections of flowers, plants, herbs, &c., &c.—many of which are of great importance to the medical and scientific world, having never before been seen or discovered by any other man, of which any account has been given.

Something New.—A man was lately tried at the Gero assizes, Canada West, for stealing a trunk and its contents. The theft was committed on board a steam boat that plies between Lewistown and Kingston. The trunk was stolen at some time while the boat was on her way from Kingston to Lewistown, and the trunk was found in the prisoners possession; but the Judge stopped the case, because there was no evidence to prove that the theft was committed while the boat was on the Canada side of the boundary line; of course, if committed on the American side, the court had jurisdiction.

All this is clear enough, but now comes the pinch of the case. The owner of the trunk applied to the court that it might be restored to him, but this the court refused, saying that the prisoner must be first convicted; the prosecutor must apply to the Governor of New York for a requisition on the Governor of Canada, to have the thief surrendered for trial in New York, and then he must be prosecuted to conviction in New York before the property could be restored.

The owner did not choose to take all this trouble, so the prisoner was discharged—taking the trunk with him, of course. This seems to be a rather crooked course for justice to run.—N. Y. Com. Ad.

STEEL PENS.

Steel Pens are now in almost universal use, and yet probably few persons, except the manufacturers and those they employ, know any thing of the way in which these instruments are made. Alderson's treatise gives the modus operandi.

"In the first place, flat sections of steel are cut out, of the shape required, by a stamping press; they are then placed under another press—which pierces the holes and cuts the slits; and they are then struck into their convex shape by a third press.

"They have then to be polished and tempered, which is managed in a peculiar apparatus, called, emphatically, 'the Devil,' consisting of a fly wheel and a box, in which the pens are placed, and to which a motion is given, resembling that exhibited in shaking materials together in a bag. This motion is continued for eight hours, when the pens are found to be completely deprived, by their friction against each other, of any asperities which might have existed on their edges, and which, though invisible to the naked eye, would have obstructed the free passage of the pens. After this process, they are tempered in a box, shaken, and brought to a blue color, being carefully watched, and the heat lessened whenever a shade of yellow is observed on their surface.

"The slit is then completed by touching the sides with a pair of pincers. Some idea may be given of the greater rapidity with which steel pens are made than the quill, when we state that of the latter an expert pen-cutter can only make six hundred a day, whilst with the receipt steel pen machines as many may be made in a single hour, with the greatest ease.

"The steel of which these pens are made, is frequently alloyed with some other metal, in order to improve the elasticity, and in some cases to prevent rust; but the steel alone employed in this country (England,) for making pens, amounts to one hundred and twenty-five tons annually, which is equivalent to about three hundred millions of pens—a number employing such an immense amount of labor and ingenuity as to be scarcely credible, did not the Parliamentary returns attest the fact."

BOILED CAT.

The facetious editor of the Lowell Times tells a good story of a fellow what got his sufficiency of boiled cat, and as it has a moral, we gladly publish it.

A few years ago, a farmer, who was noted for his waggery, stopped at a tavern, which he was in the habit of calling at, on his way from H— to Salem.

The landlady had got the pot boiling for dinner, and the cat was washing her face in the corner. The traveller, thinking it would be a good joke, took off the pot lid, and while the landlady was absent, put grimalkin in the pot with the beef and potatoes, and then pursued his journey to Salem.

The astonishment of the landlady may well be conceived when in taking up her dinner, she discovered the unpalatable addition which was made to it. Knowing well the disposition of her customer, she had no difficulty in fixing on the transgressor, and she determined to be avenged. Aware that he would stop on his return home for a cold bite, the cat was carefully dressed. The wag called as expected, and pussy was put on the table amongst other cold dishes, but so disguised that he did not know his old acquaintance.

He made a hearty meal and washed it down with a glass of gin. After paying his bill, he asked the landlady if she had a cat she could give him for a while. She said she could not, for she had lost hers. What, says he, don't you know where it is? Oh, yes, replied the landlady, you just eat it.

He was never known to boil a cat afterwards.

IMPORTANT DISCOVERY.

We find in the Liverpool Mercury (says the Boston Journal) an account of the discovery of a method of preserving bread for an indefinite length of time. It seems that some time ago a Mr. Gilbert Claude Alzard, a Frenchman, discovered a peculiar mode of manufacturing bread, biscuit, macaroni &c., which should possess the property of being impervious to decay, as well as of being considerably cheaper than the ordinary articles in use. In 1841 he succeeded in securing from the Emperor of Brazil a patent right for his invention; but, from the violence with which he was opposed in that country, Mons. Alzard was compelled to give up the attempt to effect any thing there, and he determined to proceed to England with his invention, taking with him very flattering testimonials. The Mercury says: "Previous to leaving the Brazil, however, a portion of the manufactured articles, consisting of biscuits, fine and coarse, was inclosed in a small wooden box closely fastened, but not air-tight. The box in question was then tied with tape, the ends of which were sealed with the seal of her Majesty's consul at Rio Janeiro, and a certificate attached, to the endorsement, certifying that on the 22d of January, 1842, the contents (biscuits) were so enclosed. On Wednesday, in the presence of several influential gentlemen assembled in the Mayor's private room, at the town-hall, the box was opened by the town clerk, its security having been previously ascertained by all present, and the genuineness of the seal verified by the Brazilian Vice Consul, both of whom were present. Although nearly two years had elapsed since they were packed, the contents proved as sound, sweet, and in all respects as good, as on the day they were enclosed. This bread was manufactured of a mixture in certain proportions, of rice and wheat flour. The coarsest quality of flour may be used, and will produce bread not inferior to that made of the finest description of flour by the ordinary method. It is also, we are informed, extremely nutritious, very beneficial to the system, and a certain antiscorbutic. Some of it eaten by the Mayor, who pronounced it excellent; in which opinion he was joined by all present. It was asserted by M. Alzard, the discoverer of the process, that the bread would keep two centuries, without the slightest alteration, and it can be offered to the consumer at 6s per cwt. less than the ordinary biscuit. He has secured the right to manufacture it in the country by patent."

FRANCE.

THE FORTIFICATIONS OF PARIS.

A late number of the Courier Francois says:—Paris is about to be encompassed by a girdle of twenty citadels, of which the perimeter is fourteen myriametes, nearly twenty two leagues. Of these nine are almost terminated, viz: Mount Valerien; the fort de St. Denis; Mont St. Maurice; Rosny; Nogent-sur-Marne; Vincennes; Aforti; Ivry, and Issy. All could at present be armed, but the barracks are not yet finished in all. In six the works are in a great state of forwardness, viz: the Briche, the double couronne of the North, at Saint Denis, Romainville, Bicetre, Montrouge, and Vanvres. One was begun this spring, that of Aubervilliers. Four are still only marked out, viz: Meudon, Viroflay Asnieres, and the Pont de Saint Maur. There are thus, in all twenty bastilles, of four or five batteries each, bound together by strategic roads, meeting at Vincennes, the central arsenal. The whole line of forts, as well as the continuous wall, currents of water, and the roads, are commanded by the citadel of Mont Valerien, which is to be mounted, as well as Vincennes. As to the citadels, they are to be for the moment occupied each by several battalions of infantry, and there can, thanks to the arsenal of Vincennes and the strategic roads, be placed on the ramparts two hundred pieces of artillery in less than twenty four hours. The continuous wall is not yet terminated at Grenelle, in the plains of Saint Denis, and above the station of Ivry, and has not been commenced between Saint Mandé and Bercy.

Mr. Welsh writes:

In answer to the opposition alarm and thunder about the armament of the fortifications, the Journal des Debats states, semi-officially, that not a gun has been yet cast; not a single preparation made, for the purpose; except the appointment, by the minister of war, of a committee of superior responsible officers of the artillery and engineers to decide on the material, and dimensions, and execution of the pieces, which may not even be begun for three years to come. The necessary appropriations, it is added, for the material are not likely to be asked of the chambers before the session of 1845 or '46. The hope or design of the phantasmagoria was to excite the million to a coup d'etat by which an end would be put to the whole enterprise. Paris will be fortified, and in an incomparable way. God help those who shall happen to be within the walls in the event of a siege!

A religious magazine observes that, even handed, almighty justice means to render these fortifications the full and final punishment of the Parisians for their multifarious and heinous offences since the year 1790. As a proper sequel to some new revolution, or war of conquest and rapine, the citadels will be used against them by a revolutionary directory, or another Bonaparte, as the fortresses about Barcelona are now battering that perpetually mutinous town.

GERMANY.

REVENUES AND DEBTS.

An European letter gives the following extracts:

The regular public revenue of Austria is one hundred and fifty millions of florins but it can be increased, to two hundred; one hundred and more millions of dollars. The total of the Austrian public debt is nine hundred and seventy millions of florins; of interest forty six millions. The debt of Prussia is six hundred and forty seven millions of francs; that of France four thousand seven hundred millions; that of Austria six or seven years of the treasury receipts; of Prussia three of France four. The Austrian annual interest and sinking fund are thirty per cent of the revenue, the Prussian sixteen, the French twenty six. In Hungary taxation is irregular and unequal and falls on the masses; Hungarian legislative independence is disadvantageous for the imperial exchequer, and inconvenient enough in other respects.

LIST OF EUROPEAN EMBASSIES TO CHINA.

First, Dutch, arrived at Peking July 17, 1850, and remained there 91 days;
Second, Dutch, arrived June 20, 1867, remained 46 days;
Third, Russian, arrived November 5, 1862, remained 109 days;
Fourth, Russian, arrived November 18, 1870, remained 114 days;
Fifth, Papal ambassador, arrived in 1720 and remained 91 days;
Sixth, Portuguese, arrived 1st May 1753, remained 30 days;
Seventh, English, arrived 4th August 1793, and remained 47 days;
Eighth, Dutch, arrived 10th January 1795, remained 35 days;
Ninth, Russian in 1806;
Tenth, English in 1810; remained 15 days;

Eleventh, the French embassy about to set out under M. Lagrenée.

A French Journal remarks that it must be inferred that the Chinese etiquette requires in order to obtain an interview with the emperor that the ambassador shall proceed from the palace gate to the throne upon his knees, strike the earth nine times with his forehead, and several times kiss the left toe of the emperor.

The brig Paul Jones arrived at New York brings dates from Canton to the 21st of June. An exchange of ratifications of the late treaty with England had not yet taken place, at which the Canton Press exhibits some degree of importance. The delay is attributed to the dilatory movements of the Chinese commissioners.

We make a few extracts:

Keying, the imperial commissioner, arrived at Canton on Sunday the 4th of June, and on Tuesday the British functionaries repaired to the city to visit his excellency who was expected to Hong Kong on the 10th to exchange the ratifications of the late treaty with England; but in this expectation the good people were disappointed, for his excellency did not intend to budge until about the first of July. In the mean time a splendid house has been prepared for his use, and a spacious hall built for the exchange of the documents. It was rumored that he would not condescend to go down to Hong Kong, but must have her Britannic majesty's plenipotentiary meet him half way.

General Salton, British commander-in-chief of the forces in China, arrived in the war steamer Prosperine on the 18th June; and went up in the steamer to Canton on the 18th on a private visit.

A new Roman Catholic Church was opened for worship on the eleventh June,

MORE RUMOR FROM WASHINGTON.

The New York True Sun says:—A private letter from a gentleman at Washington, possessing every means of knowing what he communicates, informs us that "several Foreign appointments will soon be made vacant. Col. Todd is expected to return from Russia, Mr. Jenifer from Austria, and Barrow from Portugal. The latter mission has been tendered to Mr. Tyson of Philadelphia, one of the original friends of Gen. Harrison. The mission to Portugal has since been offered to and accepted by a gentleman in North Carolina.

Mr. Wise is spoken of for the Austrian mission, and Mr. Spencer for that of Russia. Other diplomatic changes are in anticipation. Mr. Everett will be recalled in a few weeks, but who will be sent to London or Paris, has not been settled.

The Bar gives the following description of "dodging" in a new farce called the "Artful Dodger":

"Now, sir, I'll prove how useful, philosophical, and beneficial my speculations are. I order a suit of clothes which I never intend to pay for—benefits tailor. As how? He orders a piece of cloth of wolen draper. Cloth being ordered, he benefits wolen draper, on strength of which he orders new dresses for family—benefits dry goods store. Dry goods store, on new dresses being ordered, invites large party to dinner. Butcher, upon meat being ordered, treats a friend to a theatre—benefits theatre. Butcher comes out, asks a friend to drink—benefits hotel. Friend gets drunk, kicks up a row, is put in the watch house, fined for getting drunk—fine goes to corporation—benefits corporation. So, by ordering a suit of clothes, which I never intend to pay for, I benefit a whole community."

Snuff.—Lord Stanhope made a calculation touching snuff. He maintained that "every professed, inveterate, and incurable snuff taker, at a moderate computation, takes one pinch in ten minutes. Every pinch, with the agreeable ceremony of blowing and wiping the nose, and other incidental circumstances, consumes a minute and a half. One minute and a half out of every ten minutes, allowing sixteen hours to a snuff-taking day, amounts to two hours and twenty-four minutes out of every natural day, or one day of every ten. One day out of every ten amounts to thirty-six days and a half in a year. Hence, if we suppose the practice to be persisted in forty years, two entire years of the snuff-taker's life would be devoted to tickling his nose, and two more to blowing it!"

Scrap of History.—During the whole seven years of the war of the Revolution, the British were never permitted to rest for a single night on Connecticut soil. They made repeated attempts, and in three or four instances succeeded in making little inroad into the State, but they were not permitted to remain securely an hour.

A boy in Vermont, on hearing that the temperance folks in Boston were in such a hurry to get rid of their cider that they were paying loafers 75 cents a day for drinking it, said if his father was there he might make three or four dollars a day, easy.

A country lad went a courting, but his father found it out, and forbid the matter, as the girl was not good enough for him. "Well father, said he, I thought she'd do to try on."

Duty on flour imported into New Grenada.—From an official publication at the seat of our General Government dated, Department of State, Washington, Oct. 6th, 1843.

We learn that information has been received at the department from F. W. Robinson, esq., United States Consul at Santa Martha, New Grenada, that the Legislature of Santa Martha has imposed a duty of one dollar per barrel on flour, in addition to a previous one of fifty cents, making the duty now per barrel $1.50. He has also transmitted the copy of an act passed at the last session of the Congress of New Grenada, which is published for the benefit of our citizens engaged in the whole fishing in the Pacific.

Article 1st. The productions, whether natural or manufactured, of the Republic of the Equator, which may be imported into the province of Veraguas, by the river San Pedro to the port of Montijo, shall enjoy the same exemption from the national duties, as if they had been introduced by the custom houses established on the boundary lines. The vessels so introducing them shall not pay tonnage duty, nor any other port charges whatever, provided such vessel does not exceed fifty tons by measurement.

Article 2d. Vessels employed in the whole fishery, which may arrive at the port of Montijo to water or to purchase provisions, shall not be subject to tonnage duty, nor to any duty whatever; but if such vessels shall pass from the port of Montijo to any other port of the Republic either in ballast or with part of cargo on board, they will then be subject to pay in the last port they may go to, the tonnage duty and other port charges, as by law established.

Letter from Bermuda.—By the way of Halifax we have received to the 20th ult. The fever continues to rage alarmingly, and is still spreading. The rock hospital is crowded with victims, and on the 22d the commissioner's residence was converted into a hospital for the convicts.—The deaths in Ireland Island has been 55; in Saint George's 100. In Ireland Island over 300 persons were lying ill of the dreadful malady; but in Saint George's the fever had abated, and had every appearance that it would speedily disappear.

Deaf and Dumb.—A friend of ours, a short time since, handed us a scrap of an old newspaper nearly worn out, from which with difficulty we extract the following sketch of an examination held at the Deaf and Dumb Institution in London, of the children in their knowledge of the divine truth:

A little boy was asked in writing, who made the earth?

In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth.

The clergyman then inquired in a similar manner,

Why did Jesus Christ come into the world?

A smile of gratitude and delight rested on the countenance of the little fellow, as he wrote,

This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptance, that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners.

A third was then proposed, evidently adapted to call his most powerful feelings into exercise—

Why were you born deaf and dumb, when I can hear and speak?

Never, said an eye witness, shall I forget the look of resignation which sat on his countenance, as he took up the chalk and wrote,

SHERMAN'S

MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

CAMPOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after disipation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12th cents), brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

(22-y1) J. SNIDER,

Sole Agent for the City of Nauvoo

NAUVOO SEMINARY.

Mr. Joseph N. and Miss Adelia Cole, would respectfully inform the citizens of Nauvoo, that they have opened a school in the large and convenient room, in the second story of President Joseph Smith's store, on the corner of Water and Grand streets, on Tuesday the 11th inst. (July) for the instruction of male and female.

Having been long engaged as teachers of seminaries in the east on the most approved systems, they feel confident that they will be enabled to give complete satisfaction to those who may favor them with their patronage.

Their most earnest and undivided attention will be paid to the instruction of those put under their charge. The strictest attention will be given to the improvement of the morals of all, and especially to those of females.

AMERICA TO IRELAND.

Men of Ireland! from the graves
Where our fathers sleep,
Come a voice, like coming waves,
Stern and deep;
From the hill-side and the valley,
And the mountain glen;
Hearken! for it bids you rally,
In the might of Men!
Hearken!—Thus its murmurs swell—
"Sons of glorious sires!
By the shores ye love so well,
By your lyres:
By your martyr'd dead who slumber;
And by home and hearth,
Let not tyrants longerumber,
Thus your glowing ear:
"S and erect in God's name stand!
Onward for the Right,
Heart to heart, and hand to hand,
To the fight!
Bury no more the driven cattle,
To the sword and the spear;
Onward! and in Freedom's battle,
God will give ye ward!
"Onward! wherefore should ye pause?
Fear ye death, should come?
What is life when a spot awa Strike ye dumb!
What when Hope's last link is sundered
What!—oh, better far
Than the ocean's ye are thundered, Than be what ye are!"
Men of Ireland! thus the graves
Of our fathers cry,
Men, who rather than be slaves
J yd to die.
And the sons from hill and valley,
And from mountain glen,
Catch the song, and bid ye rally,
In the might of Men!
Bid ye rally, like your sires,
Strong to do or die,
Till young Freedom's beacon fires
Gild your sky.
God is with ye—who shall falter!
Justice, who withstand!
Onward then! for hearth and altar,
Right and native land!

From the Ottawa Free Trader.

IMPORTANT CANAL NEWS.

We hasten to lay before our readers
the following highly gratifying intelligence, received by the eastern mail this morning. We have no time for comment, but read—the letter is sufficiently intelligible:

Correspondence of the Free Trader.

Boston, Oct. 19, 1843.

Messrs. Editors—One of the commissioners of Illinois arrived yesterday by the steamer Hibernia, from Liverpool.
The other Commissioner remains to settle some details. They have at last made an arrangement with the bond-holders which will secure the completion of the canal. The bond-holders agree to advance first half a million, and then if the State continues to show a disposition to be honest, they agree to continue the advances until the canal is completed. But they reserve the right after the advance of half a million to withhold the remainder if the state attempts to break faith or repudiate her debts.

Among the subscribers to the loan are the eminent houses of Baring Brothers & Co., Hope & Co. of Amsterdam, N. M.
Rothschild & Sons, and Magniac, Jardine & Co., besides other wealthy houses. The interest and capital, therefore, which is now enlisted will secure the completion of the canal at an early day, unless the madness of the State should prevent it. After the bond-holders have advanced half a million more, there can be no doubt but they will advance the remainder, unless prevented by the dishonesty of the State, for the half million advanced will be a dead loss without the advance of the remainder;
so we need have no fear of failure on the part of the bond-holders; if the State pursues the course which honesty and policy both dictate. The bond-holders are not only willing to complete our canal, but they are willing to aid Illinois in the completion of any other of her important public works, if she will only try to help herself. "Do what is right—pay according to your means, and act towards us as you would require a debtor to act towards you"—was the language of the bond-holders to the agents of the State.
They ask for no impossibilities, but they ask for honest and honorable treatment from the State—if she is not willing to grant it, she is not deserving of aid or sympathy. But I have too much confidence in the honor and integrity of the citizens of Illinois, to believe for a single moment that they have any other desire than the payment of the public debt.

The bond-holders say: "If you only show a desire to pay according to your means, we care not how small the payment may be at first, we know that the rapid increase of the wealth of the State will soon enable you to pay in full." Illinois now stands fair in Europe, and if she ever loses the confidence and respect of her creditors, it must be her own fault.

The Commissioners have made an arrangement for emigration next spring, which will throw a flood of wealth and population into our State. Some of the wealthiest men in Europe have lent their encouragement to it. The star of Illinois is the ascendant, and I earnestly pray that it may continue to ascend until it reaches that high destiny that nature designed for it!

The agent of the bond-holders, who has been selected from Boston, will accompany the Commissioner immediately to Illinois, to commence operations.

Yours truly,
ALMA.

From the London Morning Chronicle, Oct. 3.

MONEY MARKET AND CITY NEWS.

We readily give publicity to the subjoined proposal, by the Commissioners of the State of Illinois, for the holders of the Illinois Canal Stock, for raising funds to complete the Illinois and Michigan Canal; upon the security of the provisions of an act of the Legislature of the State of Illinois, passed at its last session, and to answer thereto, which, in the character of "Undersigned," already embraces the eminent firms of Messrs. Hope and Co., of Amsterdam; Messrs. Rothschilds of London; Messrs. Baring Brothers and Co.;
and Messrs. Magniac, Jardine, and Co.

The signatures of these influential houses will probably induce many parties to follow their example, and lead finally to the acceptance and fulfilment of the conditions therein expressed. This document forms a most important feature in the history of American finance, and is the first practical movement that has taken place, since the crash of 1836, really calculated to re-establish American credit. The news brought by the last steamer speaks most favorably of trade, and of an advance in the price of American Stocks, but we have seen nothing on the part of the indebted states calculated to increase confidence in the expectations held by their unfortunate and suffering creditors, that they will provide, by adequate taxation, for the payment of the interest on their public debt.

This is much to be regretted, and the liberal conduct of the great firms above mentioned, in coming forward as they have done, is made thus more remarkably prominent.

If it be properly met and appreciated in America, the step they have taken will do much to restore credit and confidence, not only in the state of Illinois, but in the other American states.

If, on the other hand, any difficulty is allowed to appear, any "hitch" to interfere or to produce even a delay in the fulfilment of the obligations on the part of Illinois, the consequences will be most fatal, and all confidence in the good faith will be sunk forever.

TO THE HOLDERS OF ILLINOIS CANAL STOCK.

The Legislature of Illinois at its last session passed a law for the purpose of raising the funds necessary to complete the Illinois and Michigan Canal, authorizing the Governor to place the canal and all the canal lands in trust for the security of the holders, the main provisions of this act are:

1. That the Governor should be authorized to negotiate a loan solely on the credit of the canal and its lands of $1-000,000, to bear 6 per cent. annual interest. The holders of existing canal bonds and other claims on the canal, are to have the first right to subscribe in proportion to their claims in respect of which they so subscribe are to be duly registered.

2. That the canal and canal property should be vested in three trustees, one to be named by the Governor, and two by the subscribers to the loan.

3. That at least $100,000 of this loan should be paid in during the course of the first year after the execution of the trust deed.

4. That the canal shall be finished in three years from the commencement of the trust.

5. That no sales of the canal lands shall be made until three months after the completion of the canal, when the trustees are to offer them for sale.

6. That all proceeds of the canal and canal property should be first applied to the payment of interest and principal of the proposed loan of $1,000,000.

7. To payment of interest on the canal stock registered by holders who are subscribers to this new loan.

8. To payment of interest on the canal stock, not so registered.

4. To reimbursements of the registered canal stock held by the subscribers to the said loan; and after the due performance of these various engagements on the part of the trustees, the canal shall revert to the state of Illinois.

The canal has already cost the state of Illinois $5,000,000.
The lands amounting to 230-476 acres, valued after the completion of the canal, at $10 per acre, 2,304,670 Lots in the various towns on the canal, valued at 1,900,000
$9,204,670

The object of the legislature in passing this act, is not to repudiate any part of the state debt, since Illinois has never denied her obligation to meet all her engagements, although forced to plead her present inability to comply with them—nor is it given to any portion of her debt an undue preference; but the canal being in its present state unproductive, it is just that those who advance the money to complete it should have a first claim upon it, and the desire of the legislature has been to raise by this means, a sum sufficient for the completion of this work, and thus provide means for the gradual payment of the canal debt, and by greatly enhancing the value of the lands, and developing the resources of the state, enable her to redeem her good faith towards her creditors at large. With this object the undersigned were instructed and empowered by the Governor to treat with the holders of the Illinois canal stock.

The whole canal debt amounts to $5-000,000; and to raise the required sum of $1,000,000 an advance of 32 per cent.
would be necessary from each holder, of which one quarter would be paid in the year following the execution of the trust.

Of the above debt, about $1,200,000 are held in the United States, and of this amount the holders of about $1,000,000 have agreed with the undersigned to advance their proportion, if full effect be given to the proposed plan.

Upon application to the trustees, established in the Illinois stock, and whose opinion must have weight with us, we find an objection to contribute in any way toward the completion of the public works in Illinois, whilst the state makes no provision for any part of the accrued, or accruing, dividends on its debt. We humbly submit that the great depression under which the whole of the United States have labored, and in which Illinois has fully shared the great depreciation of the property and produce of that State, the monetary crisis in which she has been involved, by passing from an inflated paper circulation to a special currency—the total cessation of all pecuniary aid toward the execution of these public works which were undoubtedly commenced on too extensive a scale, but to the completion of which the state sanguinely looked for the means to pay her debt and raise an income; the check which the financial difficulties of the state have given to immigration of settlers, and increase of her population, and the statement that whilst the ordinary state and county taxes amount to $450,000, her present population does not exceed five hundred thousand, by the last census, and there are for a great part deprived of markets for the fruits of their labor by the want of the means of communication, are facts which, although they may not excuse any departure from the strict rules of justice, may account to those acquainted with the internal condition of Illinois for the temporary delay in providing for the interest on its debt.

But, however much we must regret this state of things, it is evident that we have no legal power to bind the state to any other financial measures than those which are at present adopted, and we can only engage to represent the opinions expressed here to our fellow-citizens, and to urge the Governor and (through him) the Le-gisature of the state, to adopt, at its next session, effectual measures for satisfying the claims of justice to the utmost ability of the state. The Legislature does not assemble in the ordinary session before December 1844. An extra session would cost, in unavoidable expenses, from $75-000 to $100,000, and it would appear improbable, or for the interest of the creditors, to force an impoverished state to incur such an expense. On the other hand, if an outlay upon the canal be deferred until 1845, the dilapidation of the existing works will be most ruinous, and the ultimate expense of their completion will be much increased; whilst it would appear that the plan which we are authorized by the act to carry into effect, would afford ample security to parties loaning the sum required, would produce in a limited period of time sufficient income to meet the interest of the canal debt, and vastly improve the position of all the state creditors, by reducing the amount of the liabilities and developing the resources of Illinois.

We are ready, however, to rest the full adoption of our plan upon the satisfaction of the creditors with the future effects of our fellow citizens to meet their engagements, and propose that holders of the canal stock, or other parties, should only subscribe 10 per cent. on the canal debt of $5,000,000, in order to raise $500-000 for the work of 1844, to the time of the ordinary meeting of the Legislature, and that even the subscription of the said 10 per cent. should only be binding on the parties so subscribing, provided that a competent and trustworthy agent sent to verify our statement, shall report—

"That the whole canal debt and liability for past works do not exceed $5,000-000."

"That the cost of the completion of the canal would not exceed $1,600,000."

"That there is every ground to believe that with that outlay the canal would be completed in three years."

"That the estimate of its annual income would be at least sufficient to meet the interests and principal of the loan of $1-000,000."

"That holders of canal stock in the U-States have agreed to advance their proportion at $1,600,000 on one million stock, and that such engagement can be relied on."

"That the terms of the proposed trust deeds shall give full and satisfactory security to the subscribers."

In case the answer to such enquiries be satisfactory, and the sum of not less than $500,000 be subscribed, the trustees of the canal property will deliver to the subscribers on receipt of the money, certificates to bearer for the amount received, with interest at the rate of six per cent, payable in New York. That title to interest to commence from the payment of the subscription and the payment of interest to be made out of the first proceeds of the canal or canal lands.

If the act of the Legislature of Illinois which has been referred to, were carried into full effect the following would be the comparative condition of the state debt:
Total debt on the first of December 1842,
$14,497,474 91

Since reduced by settlements with banks, &c. 3,100,000

To be reduced by sale of Internal Improvement property. 1,720,000

To be provided for by canal, and canal lands, 5,000,000

$10,442,000
Leaving thus only, $1,077,474 91, to be provided for by taxation or the other resources of the state.

CHARLES OAKLEY, Commissioner
MICHAEL RYAN, } for Illinois.
London, September, 1843.

The undersigned holders of Illinois Canal bonds, having had under our consideration the above statement of the commissioners deputed by the Governor of the state of Illinois, and the circular issued by them, bearing date May 25th, 1843, considering that the canal bonds were issued on the faith and credit of the state of Illinois, and not of the canal alone, and that the state was bound to provide for the payment of the interest thereon; and that in fact no provision is by the said act made for the fulfilment of such obligations, but the creditors are left to the chance of the success of the canal, are not prepared to subscribe our respective proportions of the sum of $1,000,000 necessary to complete the canal in the manner contemplated by the Legislature but we are nevertheless willing, and hereby agree to advance to the trustees to be appointed in the manner pointed out by the said act the sum so opposite to our respective names in the list of the commissioners, for the immediate purpose of continuing the work in progress, such sums being at the rate of 12 1/2 per cent., on the canal bonds held by us respectively, subject to the following conditions:

1st. That the facts contained in the preceding statement shall be verified to the satisfaction of Messrs. Baring Brothers & Co., and Messrs. Magniac, Jardine & Co., shall also be satisfied of the power of the governor to carry this proposal into effect.

2d. That the governor of the state shall enter into a contract, under the provisions of the 21st section of the act, for securing the repayment of the monies to be advanced by us, with interest thereon, at the rate of 6 per cent upon the canal lands, in manner pointed out in the said Act of the Legislature of Illinois, and shall for that purpose vest the said canal lands in trustees as there mentioned.

3d. That the sum to be advanced by us, in pursuance of this agreement, shall rank pari passu with any other sums to be contributed towards the completion of the canal, and in pursuance of the said act or otherwise, so as to constitute part of sum not exceeding one million dollars, which shall have precedence over, and shall be paid together with the interest thereon, before any other claims now existing, or hereafter to be created upon the said canal lands, and the tolls and profits thereof, and the trust to be created in pursuance of the said act, and shall continue until our respective advances are fully paid and satisfied with interest, any thing in the said act contained is the contrary notwithstanding.

4th. That the subscribers or holders of certificates of this subscription, shall be entitled at any time to register canal bonds, held by them to the extent of eight times the amount of such subscription, and upon payment of the remaining 10 1/2 per cent required by the act; and that such bonds shall have such priority in payment of principal and interest, as is by the act provided for registering canal bonds.

5th. That certificates bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum, and payable to bearer, shall be issued to us for the sums by us respectively agreed to be advanced as aforesaid; and the governor of the state shall in the contract to be entered into, release all conditions contained in the act, for forfeiting the sums advanced, or for determining the trust, before the full payment of our advances and interest; and it shall be provided that no subscriber shall be responsible for, nor shall his securities, or the priorities thereof be affected or prejudiced by the act or defaults of any other subscribers; and further, that in case of difference between the trustees, as to the application of the money subscribed towards the completion of the canal and works, or as to any other matters entrusted to them, the decision of the majority shall be conclusive.

6th. The governor of the state of Illinois shall engage to urge upon the legislature in their next session, to make provision out of the resources of the state, and if need be by taxation, for payment of the future interest on its public debt, including the canal bonds, to such extent as the means of the state will enable it, and further to issue debentures of the state, bearing interest at the rate of six per cent per annum, for the dividends now in arrear, and such part of the future dividends as shall be provided for as aforesaid.

7th. That signaturs to the above engagement are to be of no force unless the sum of four hundred thousand dollars at least shall be subscribed; and it is understood that the said Baring Brothers and Co. Magniac, Jardine and Co. contract no responsibility, either towards the state or the subscribers, by the exercise of their judgment as to the quantity subscribed to them.

THE ILLINOIS CANAL.

We learn that Messrs. Sturgis, Ward and Lawrence, of Boston, were commissioned by the foreign bondholders to numinate an agent in this country to verify the estimates and statements on which was based the proposition submitted to the bondholders by Messrs. Oakley & Ryan, for the purpose of obtaining a further advance of one million six hundred thousand, sufficient to complete and put in operation the Illinois and Michigan Canal.

The Boston gentlemen have executed their commission by the appointment of the Hon. John Davis, late governor of Massachusetts, and formerly United States Senator. Their selection cannot fail to be equally satisfactory to Americans interested in this great work; and we are happy to learn that governor Davis has accepted the agency, and will proceed at once to the execution of his duties. He is expected in New York on his way to Illinois in the course of the present week.
He will proceed to that state in company with Mr. Ryan, the commissioner, who returned from Europe in the last steamer.
After reaching that state, it is believed that two or three will be sufficient to enable the agent to satisfy himself, in regard to the accuracy of the estimates and representations; inasmuch as the contractors on whose offers these estimates were based are represented to be still ready to undertake the work on their original terms.

If the result of governor Davis's investigations be satisfactory, as anticipated, it will then be incumbent on him to summon the bondholders to the election at Lockport, on the canal, of two trustees, one of whom is to be appointed by the proxy of the foreign and the other by the American bondholders. With these will be associated a third, to be nominated by the governor of Illinois. This body is to be vested with full authority to make all contracts for the completion of the canal, to make all necessary disbursements, and to receive all accruing revenues; also, to sell canal property, &c. on account of the bondholders.

It is understood that the person selected as trustee by the foreign bondholders is a Mr. Brauder, formerly of Bremen, and more recently of Hamburg, who is now on his way to this country. The American holders have not yet made a selection.
Colonel Oakley, one of the commissioners, is likely enough to be appointed by the governor of Illinois on the part of the state.

If governor Davis reports in favor of the accuracy of the estimates, &c., the foreign bondholders are to advance 12 1/2 per cent on the amount of their subscriptions, to ensure the progress of operations on the canal until the meeting of the Legislature. If, when this body convenes, a disposition is manifested to make some provisions within the ability of the state to pay any part of the accruing interest on the debt by the imposition of a tax therefore, then the advance will be continued till the foreign holders have paid up their quota, amounting to about one million two hundred thousand dollars, of the one million six hundred thousand dollars.—Journal of Com.

SOCIETY ISLANDS.

Almost simultaneously with news of the restoration of the Sandwich Islanders to the native Government, we have intelligence that the British Admiral Nicholas at the Society Islands in the Mediterranean, have disavowed the French usurpation there established, and forbidden British subjects in those Islands from holding themselves amenable to existing French authorities. This position he declares his purpose to maintain at all hazards, until the will of his sovereign shall be known; but hopes that no actual collision with the French authorities will be rendered necessary. He also speaks of being governed in his proceedings by "orders that he has received," but whether those orders emanated directly from the British Government, or from Admiral Thomas, the British commander-in-chief in the Pacific, does not distinctly appear.
But in either case, the step thus taken affords a probable indication of the course which will be pursued by the British Government in reference to the French usurpation. Indeed it is stated expressly by Admiral Nicholas that while England wishes not, and desires not, to maintain a paramount influence at the Society Islands, she is determined on other nations shall possess a greater influence or authority in those Islands, than that which from her long and intimate connexion with them, she claims as her natural right to exercise. This is plain language, and if authorized by the British Government, as it seems to be, France will find it necessary to yield, or incur the most serious responsibilities.

Now that New England, in reference partly to the claims of the United States, has relinquished her jurisdiction over the Sandwich Islands, and acknowledged their independence, she can, with better grace, demand that France shall pursue a similar course in regard to the Society Islands, and the same relations as the U. States did to the Sandwich Islands.

The United States and all other commercial nations are interested, in common with England, in maintaining the entire independence of the Society Islands, as well as the Sandwich, and we trust that our government will not hesitate to express these views to that of France, and earnestly solicit her to abandon the exclusive jurisdiction which she has unfortunately set up. Those two points in the great Pacific, the Sandwich and Society Islands, seem intended by providence for the common benefit of commercial nations; all of whom, it seems to us, should insist upon the preservation of this common right.—

The Quaker's Letter to his Watchmaker.—I herewith send thee my pocket clock, which standeth greatly in need of thy friendly correction.—
The last time that he was in thy friendly school, he was not in the least degree reformed or benefited thereby, for I perceive by the index of his mind that he is a liar, and the truth is not in him. His motions are wavering and irregular, his pulse is sometimes quick —betokeneth not an even temper; at other times he waxes sluggish. Although I frequently tell him, that he should be on his duty, as thou know-est his name denoteth, I find him slumbering and sleepy; or as the vanity of human reason phrases it, I catch him napping—hence I am induced to believe he is not yet right in the inward man; cleanse him, therefore, thoroughly, I pray thee, with thy charming physic, from all pollution, that he may vibrate and circulate according to truth. I will leave him a few days under thy friendly charge, and I will pay for his board as thou requirest it.
I entreat thee friend John, to demean thyself on this occasion, with a right judgment, according to the skill that is within thee, and prove thyself a workman that need not be ashamed of his work; and when thou layest the correcting hand on him, let it be without passion, lest thou drive him to destruction. Do thou regulate and govern his motion for the time to come by the motion of the light that ruleth the day, and when thou findest him corrected from the error of his ways, and more conformable to the above-mentioned rules, do thou send him home with a just bill of charges drawn out in the spirit of moderation.

ded a dozen voices. "Well," said the enquirer, again placing his sugar between his lips, and puffing away for dear life,
"is to some folks!"

cool, calm, and quiet way of dealing with the wrongs we meet with.

Prayer.—The following prayer (the papers say) was made by an Irishman, in the woods between New York and Canada, in 1787: "Lord, have compassion upon me, a poor unfortunate sinner, three thousand miles from my own country, and seventy-five miles from any where else!"

A lady correspondent of the National Intelligencer, speaking of Prince Albert, says she is, inclining to stoutness—hair, whiskers, and moustache of a light color as my own. The young lady certainly needs a grammar or a dictionary.

An Editor's Lament.—The editor of the Tallahassee Floridian, in alluding to the late storm there, an account of which we published, "goes it strong" in this wise: "Successively visited by the scourges of an Indian war, by floods and by droughts, by failure of crops, by pestilence, by conflagrations and hurricanes and we will add, borne down by severe pecuniary distress, caused by the operation of the most vicious banking system ever known, and that worse managed than any where else—an earthquake is only necessary to cap the climax of our calamities." Poor fellow!

A gentleman being called upon to subscribe to a course of lectures, objected, "because," said he, "my wife gives me a gratuitous lecture every evening."

Agricultural.

THE POULTRY YARD.

The Common Hen.—If well fed, and allowed to roam in a farm yard, a good hen will deposit in the course of twelve months about 200 eggs; but if left entirely to herself, she seldom lays more than fifteen eggs in the same nest without attempting to hatch them; but if eggs only be desired, they should be removed often, leaving one, and she will continue to lay for a long time. When the hen begins to sit, nothing can excite her perseverance and patience; she continues for some days immovable; and when forced away by the importunities of hunger, she quickly returns. While the hen sits, she carefully turns her eggs, until at length, in about three weeks, the young brood begin to give signs of a desire to burst their confinement. When all are produced, she then leads them forth to provide for themselves. Her affection and pride seem then to alter her very nature, and correct her imperfections. No longer voracious and cowardly, she abstains from all food that her young can swallow, and boldly flies at every creature that she thinks is likely to do them mischief.

The proper heat for hatching a hen's egg, according to some, is 104 degrees of Fahrenheit; according to others, 106 degrees; to which degree the surface of the body of the hen will raise the thermometer, when she sits upon her eggs. In those birds who do not sit constantly, but trust chiefly to the heat of the sun, as the crane, heron, ostrich, &c., the temperature of the eggs is probably below 101 degrees.

The full period of the hen in this country, is known to be 21 days. In warmer climates, it is said to be a day or two less. The following table was compiled by Count Morozzo, in a letter from him to Lacedaede; it shows the period of incubation, compared with those of the life of certain birds.

Name of Bird.	Period of Incubation.	Age.
Swan,	41 days,	about 200 y.
Parrot,	40 do	100 do
Goose,	30 do	80 do
Eagle,	30 do
Booby,	30 do
Duck,	20 do	not known.
Turkey,	20 do
Peacock,	26 to 27	25 to 28 y.
Phasian,	20 to 25	18 to 20 do
Grouse,	20	100 or more
Nightingale,	12 to 20	17 to 18 y.
Hen,	19 to 21	12 to 15
Fox on,	17 to 18	16 to 17
Canary,	13 to 14	13 to 14
Goldfinch,	13 to 14	10 to 12

The Turkey. It is thought, belonged originally to North America; but it is now common throughout Europe. It was formerly found wild in the forests of Canada and the United States; and flocks are to this day occasionally seen. The wild turkey is generally larger than the domesticated.

Young turkeys are liable to the pip—which often proves speedily fatal, if not attended to.

The remedies suggested in respect to chickens which have this disease, may, perhaps, be found equally beneficial in respect to turkeys. A writer remarks, however, that on inspecting the rump feathers two or three of their quills will be found to contain blood; but on drawing them out, the chick soon recovers; and afterwards requires no other care than common poultry.

Method of causing Cabbage to Head during the Winter.—In the fall of the year, when it is time to gather cabbages, we always find more or less of them that have not formed any heads. They may have grown well, and have a large stock of leaves, but have not closed up in the form necessary to make a good, solid, compact cabbage.

William Vance, Esq. of Readfield, has practised for many years the following method, which effectually closes these loose leaves in the course of the winter, thereby furnishing him with a supply of the best kind early in the spring. In the fall of the year, just before the ground closes up he gathers all the cabbages which have not headed together. He then digs a trench eighteen inches or more deep, and of sufficient width to admit the cabbages. He then closes the leaves together by hand, winding a wisp of straw or something else around them to keep them together, and then puts them in this trench, with heads down and roots up. He then packs straw or leaves and earth snug about them, and rounds up the earth over them. The trench should be dug in a place where the water of the rains and snows runs off and will not stand about them. A board, or couple of boards, nailed together in the form of a roof and put over the trench, may be useful.

In the spring of the year open your trench and you will find that the cabbages are all headed firmly together, and if the water has not got in, will be solid and hard. Mr. Vance has had the goodness to send us a few heads which he has formed in this way, which were very nice. By following this plan we not only preserve the cabbages well during the winter, but save much of the crop which is not considered worth much. —Maine Farmer.

Foreign News.

The affairs of Turkey.—We have been favored with the following extract from a letter bearing date Bagdad, August 20, 1843.

"I have nothing of any great importance to communicate to you on this occasion. Things are tolerably pacific; the Kerbela affair has died gradually away, and the expectations of a war between Turkey and Persia are, I am happy to say, at an end for the present; much fear and uneasiness, however, still exist. Trade, consequently, from this and other causes suffers beyond the possibility of description. Since the time at which Mahomed Najib Pacha entered Bagdad affairs have worn a most gloomy and discouraging aspect, and it seems utterly hopeless to look for any improvement under his government. While inhumanity and oppression assails the inhabitants on every hand, few of the Arab chiefs have any confidence in him, and many tribes are becoming very unsettled. The Pachalia of Mosul is even in a more deplorable condition than that of Bagdad. Commerce suffers heavily from the monopolies of the Pacha, a person who pays little attention to any treaty. It is a well known fact that no place in the Turkish empire suffers more from injustice and misgovernment than the two Pachalics on the eastern boundary, a circumstance of sufficient importance to call the attention of government to make an investigation into the actions and character of those who have the direction of affairs in those places, where individuals intrusted with power act as they please."

The Pachalic is fast falling into decay, and those who are interested in its prosperity cannot but become despondent, when hostility and indifference are thrown in the way of any efforts made to improve her wretched condition by the Pacha and petty governors of places, who are, for the most part, men who have risen from the lowest grades of society, and possess little or no principle. The Mission, which has been for some time sitting at Ezzerone, has made but little progress as to the settling of the boundary question. This affair has now been for a long time on the hinges, and there appears to be no knowing which way it may turn. Should Mahomed be given up as a free port, which is likely to be the case, it will greatly benefit this province, but at the same time, seriously injure the trade of Bassorah. —Liverpool (Eng) Standard.

Interesting from Montevideo.—By the Cuba, Captain Babson, at Boston, the editor of the Advertiser has the British Packet, of August 19, containing a correspondence between the Minister of foreign affairs of Uruguay and the British and American Consuls at Montevideo.

That functionary, in a circular dated July 13th, prohibited foreign vessels from trading to the port of Bocco, at the east of Montevideo, then in the hands of Oribe, who obtained his supplies there.

The British Consul, Mr. Dale assents to the interdiction. The American Consul, Mr. Hamilton, denies any right of the Montevidean government to regulate the trade of any point in the hands of their enemies. He shows by decision of the Supreme Court that the United States claim no such privilege themselves; and these reasons, he protests against the closing of the port of Bocco and says that he shall protest against any seizure of American vessels made under it.

He takes the same occasion to protest against the seizure already made, on the 17th, of the American schooner Carolina, at Montevideo, going at length into a consideration of that case. The American brig Trafalgar had also been seized on the 19th, it seems, but the U. S. ship John Adams having boarded her, the prize crew deserted, and she at once proceeded to Buenos Ayres.

ARRIVAL OF THE ORIENTAL—LATEST FROM INDIA AND CHINA.

The news from Scinde are important. Further hostilities have taken place, which have resulted in the entire annihilation of the force of the fugitive Amer Sher Mahomed. After a slight affair with Lieut. Anderson, which cut off his means of recruiting in Beloochistan, the Amer, finding himself surrounded by the movements of Col Roberts in the north, and of Capt Jacob on the desert, turned upon the latter (the weakest,) with about 8,000 men; but his Belooches had not resolution enough to stand—they broke and dispersed.

Previous to this, Col Roberts had succeeded in capturing Meer Shah Mahomed, and in dispersing his force.

Of the further operations, we have only disjointed accounts.

Great sickness was said to prevail amongst the troops.

Affairs at Cabul are unsettled, and intrigues are said to be going on against Dos Mahomed.

The Hurkaru mentions a report that, early in the ensuing cold weather, an army of observation, amounting to 15,000, will be assembled on the Sikh frontier, under the command of Sir Robert Dick. Some attribute this contemplated movement to the unsettled state of Punjab, and others again, to a rumored confederation of the Afghans, aided by the Persians for the recovery of Peshawar.

The accounts from China are highly satisfactory. Col Malcolm, who left Hong Kong on the first of August, in the Akbar, brought the ratification of the treaty of peace, the result of which is a new Chinese tariff and regulations for the carrying on of our commerce with that country.

Sir Henry Pottinger has announced his determination, by every means at his disposal, to see the provisions of the commercial treaty fulfilled by all who choose to engage in future in commerce with China, and that, in any case where he may receive well-grounded representations from her Majesty's consuls, or from the Chinese authorities, that such provisions of the commercial treaty have been evaded (or have been attempted to be so,) he will adopt the most stringent and decided measures against the offending parties; and where his present powers may not fully authorize and sanction such measures as may seem to him fitting, he will respectfully trust that the legislature of Great Britain will hold him indemnified for adopting them.

The smuggling vessels late at Whampoa were leaving the river, and H. M. S. Dido was stationed at Whampoa to assist in making trade regulations observed.

Meanwhile, precautions are being taken against the future. Hong Kong is to be strongly fortified.

A proclamation, issued by the High Commissioner Keying, announces that the treaty had been ratified, and regulations and tariffs agreed to, which tariffs are to take effect with reference to the commerce with China of all countries as well as of England.

INDIA.—The military news of the month does not possess much interest.

The Hyderabad force had returned to that station.

There was a great paucity of European officers at Kurrachee and Sukker.

Lieut. Horns, the adjutant of the 55th regiment, was drowned by the upsetting of a boat in Khyper district.

All officers on staff employ, belonging to corps in Sind, had been ordered to join their regiments.

The amount of prize money at Hyderabad is likely to prove very considerable.

The troops employed in Scinde at the end of June amounted to about 16,000 men, and a wing of the 78th and of the 2d Bombay Light Infantry had been sent to Kurrachee from Bombay.

A large force was stated to be assembling for duty in the Punjab, on account of recent disturbances there.

SIXTEEN LIVES LOST—DESTRUCTION OF THE STEAMER SARAH BARNES.

We are indebted to the New Orleans Picayune for a slip containing the following particulars of the loss of the Sarah Barnes, as communicated by the mate, Charles Cloud, who arrived at New Orleans on the 23d October, in a schooner from Galveston, with Mr. A. G. Abell, bearer of despatches. Mr. R. P. Pinkard, Mr. F. Pinkard, and Mr. Matthews, first engineer of the Sarah Barnes.

On the 24th ult., at noon, she crossed the Galveston bar for this port. On the next morning, the 25th, a considerable leak was discovered in her hold. All the pumps were set to work; but they were unable to keep her free for a short time only. At 9 A. M., when about seventy-five miles from Galveston, it having been found that the water was gaining on the pumps, and that both wind and sea were increasing, the Captain determined to run her into the Sabine river. But believing the accomplishment of even this doubtful from the rapid manner in which the leak increased, he concluded to run her on the nearest shore. He directed her course accordingly, the whole of the crew and passengers being in the meantime engaged in bailing her out.

At half past 2, P. M., the water, notwithstanding their exertions, had ascended to the fires and the engine. Further efforts to counteract the leak were therefore unavailing, and to save their lives became the concern of all on board. They then set about making rafts of the cotton bales—four bales to a raft—and lashed together spars for other rafts. She was now sinking rapidly; the leak was increased, and there were found six fathoms of water. There was no confusion or complaining; all seemed to be impressed with their perilous position, and to save their lives was the object which engrossed their attention. Orders were given to cast off the boat's painter, and while doing this she sunk, it being then forty-five minutes past four in the afternoon.

There were on board altogether thirty souls—of these eighteen went on the rafts, and twelve took the boat. Of the former, but five were saved, after drifting about three days and three nights. Two of them landed on Galveston Island; and the other three on Bolivar Point. Of the latter, but three perished—who were passengers; two males and a female—and they were lost in the breakers, in landing from the boat on the 26th. The following is the list of those on board, in which the names of those who perished and those whose lives have been saved are designated:

Saved.—A. G. Abell, bearer of despatches; B. P. Pinkard; F. Pinkard and servant; Charles Cloud, mate; Thompson Royle, clerk; Matthews, engineer; Steward, steward; Green, cabin boy; Gorman, bar keeper; two deck hands and two firemen.

Lost.—James Porter; H. S. Daggett; Judge Blair; Mr. Boyd; Dr. Cosgrave; a female unknown; three deck passengers; Chas. Franklin, owner and captain; Dean, second engineer; Alex. Jibell; Cook; 2 deck hands; 2 firemen.

REVIEW OF THE ST. LOUIS MARKET.

St. Louis, Nov. 9th, 1843.
REMARKS.—The weather at the close of the last week was very unsettled and wet, which operated unfavorably on the business of the levee, but since Monday morning it has been quite pleasant, and trade on the levee has been brisk.

By arrivals of boats from the south and Ohio rivers, an additional supply of ground alum, Turk's Island and Kanawha salt, has been brought into the market, which was much needed, also of sugar, coffee and whisky, of which, with the exception of the latter, the market is well supplied.

The Missouri and Illinois rivers continue in a very low stage, and in the first particularly, the boats have a good deal of difficulty in running in it—there being but five or six feet in the channel. On the principal bars in the Illinois, there is but 25 inches water. On the lower rapids of the Mississippi river there is reported scant four feet water.

Flour.—There has been but few operations during the week, the receipts being exceedingly light, and holders will not need to meet the wants of shippers. A few low country brands have been sold at $3 50 a 3 60, and of City Mills of 50 lbs and over to the city trade, at $3 87 1/2. We do not however consider the market firm at these figures, unless the receipts continue light, as but few dealers are willing to pay over $3 50. The largest lots received this week have been sent forward by first hands.

Wheat.—This article comes forward very liberally—a large proportion of which is of the new crop, and very inferior, which is very dull, as the millers will not buy it if the old can be had. A few thousand bushels were purchased for Cincinnati in the early part of the week, which had a tendency to keep the price up, but within a day or two it has given way, and good lots were sold yesterday at 50 a 52 cents; prime lots old we quote at 60 cents, and spring wheat at 45 cents.

Corn.—We believe there is no demand for shipment, but it has been in better request this week. We noticed the sale of several lots at 20 cents, without sale.

Oats.—Sales of this article have been made at 15 a 17 cents, through the week, from the levee and from wagons, the demand, however, is limited.

Barley.—Prime lots on levee in request, which we quote at 37 1/2 a 40 cents; inferior is very dull.

Beans.—Clean white beans are in moderate demand. Several lots were sold on Monday and Tuesday at 28 a 30 cents per bushel; colored are in less demand, but will bring 24 a 26 cents.

Hemp.—At the close of last week the price of this article suddenly declined, in consequence of one or two purchasers withdrawing from the market, having supplied their orders. On Monday we noticed the sale of 44 bales at $72.50 per ton; one or two smaller lots were sold on Tuesday at $70, yesterday a lot of 39 bales was sold at $70 a 72 per ton. Water rotted we quote at $3 a 4.50 per cwt. as in quality.

Wool.—There have been several lots of new beef received this week. We learned, however, but of one sale, that of 72 bbls. M. as at $5, all round. Nearly all that arrived was sent forward.

Bacon.—The market is excessively dull, and sales are affected with difficulty. The receipts have been heavy during the week, and for want of a market the most of that in shipping order was sent forward. Shoulders we quote at 20 a 21 cents, and unseasoned hams at 3 a 3 1/2, and canvassed at 5 a 5 1/2.

Butter.—Good butter is in demand, and will bring 10 to 12 1/2 cents; inferior is dull at 5 to 8 cents.

THE STEAM SHIP RACE.

We take from the N. Y. Courier, and Engineer the subjoined account of the trial of speed between the U. S. steam frigate Princeton and the British steam ship Great Western, which resulted, it will be seen, in the complete triumph of the American vessel:

The rumor that the new frigate Princeton would go to sea yesterday in company with the Great Western, drew an immense concourse of people to the Battery. During the whole morning the Princeton had been moving about the harbor instead of coming to an anchor—for the reason, as we understand, that if she anchored, she would necessarily come under the command of the officer in command of the station. The wind was blowing a little gale from the northwest; and it was a very curious spectacle to see a large ship with her sails all furled, moving about in the very teeth of the wind and tide, without a sail set, or the appearance of paddle-wheels, steam pipes, and the other usual evidences of being propelled by steam power.

She is propelled, as our readers are aware, by Ericsson's propeller; and fixed in her stern, and far below the surface of the water; while her engine is placed up on her keel near the stern, and the top of it ten feet below her water line.

She is, of course, an experiment; constructed under the immediate superintendence of Capt. Stoen to test the practicability of moving steam vessels of war by means of this new application of motive power. If successful, all the objections to the employment of steam in naval warfare are obviated at once; and of course great anxiety has been felt by all familiar with the subject, in the result of this experiment.

Those who are admitted into the secrets of her performance from the capes of the Delaware to this port, confidently predicted that she would make with ease twelve knots an hour; and while this was very naturally doubted, all who felt an interest in the subject of steam navigation most anxiously desired that she might realize the most sanguine expectations of those immediately interested in the result.

At about 1-4 to 3 o'clock, the Great Western came down the East river; and when about south of the Battery, to the astonishment of every spectator, all her sails were set, at the same time that she was blowing off steam at a rate we never witnessed before in any steamer. The truth is, she had used extra materials for creating steam for this occasion, and made double the quantity she could work. When we discovered this, and saw all her lower sails set to run before a smart breeze from the north-west, we despaired of the Princeton accomplishing much, in the way of a race without also setting her sails.

But those in charge of her knew too well her power and speed to resort to any such means of obtaining the victory; and when the Great Western had got about a quarter of a mile the start, the Princeton made after her at full speed. She passed the Battery at a race-horse pace, moving as if by magic; and three cheers showed that the spectators had now but little doubt of the result of the chase. Both ships headed direct for Quarantine—the Princeton passing to windward, and evidently overhauling the chase, hand over hand. The Western added sail after sail, as she ran before the wind, but it was evidently a hopeless matter; the Western appeared to be half a mile to the southward, and the Princeton far to the westward of her.

Up to this time, both ships had been running directly from the spectators, and it was with difficulty, except to a practiced eye, to judge of their respective positions. Now, however, they were running with their broadsides sufficiently to the battery to perceive the relative speed of each, and, to the astonishment and delight of all, the Princeton gained rapidly upon overhauled, and passed the Great Western, without showing an inch of canvas; and then commenced setting sail, and, as near as we could judge, looking through a glass, literally walked away from her!

In one word, the applicability of the propeller to steamers of every class is no longer an experiment; and we should here add, that the anxiety and delight manifested by the spectators in the success of the Princeton had nothing national or local in it, but had its origin solely in the desire to witness the triumph of what is justly considered the most important experiment in steam navigation that has been attempted since the days of Fulton.

GIRARD ESTATE.

The Suit before the United States Supreme Court.—We have now ascertained with precision whether Philadelphia is to be richer or poorer by Girard's Will. Thus it stands: Of the six judges of the Supreme Court of the United States on the bench when the case was heard, three, namely, Judges Baldwin, Catron, and Wayne, were for sustaining the Will, and the other three, namely, Judges Tancy, McLean and Daniel, were for declaring the Will inoperative as regards the Trust. Not merely the trustees is denied legal capacity, but the Trust itself. On that hangs the matter. Of the three absent judges, it is believed Judge Thompson sides with the Will, and Judge Story, by some of his written publications, is committed against it—so that the eight judges would stand four against four, as the six stood—three against three. The opinion of the ninth, Judge McKinley, is unknown—but he was the judge whose decree against the corporation power of banks, out of the State chartering them, we before mentioned as argued by C. J. Ingersoll, though overruled by the Supreme Court. So here hangs this affair. Webster is engaged as counsel against the city.—Philadelphia paper, Oct. 21.

Cure for Hard Times.—The editor of the Belfast Signal has given a prescription in the following paragraph for the cure of hard times, which cannot be otherwise than effectual. From first to last it is a personal matter, and each man must attend to his own cure: 'Drive all drones and loafers and unemployed men into some business or work—bring down salaries to the level with other things at the time being, reduce professional fees, be careful of health, that no time be lost by sickness, buy what is absolutely necessary, and pay for it down—rise early—work steadily—live prudently, wear your old clothes as long as they will do to wear, pay every dollar you owe if you possibly can do it—buy what is raised in your own country, or state, rather than what is imported, and thus keep all the money in circulation in your midst that you can—live honestly with yourself, your fellow men and your God; and when you do all these things, the times will improve.'

Original Anecdote.—When Dick Amiz first crossed into York State from the Canada side, he took lodgings at an inn in Canandaigua. A waiting-maid sat at the table with them, and Dick spoke of her as the servant to the no small scandal of 'mine host,' who told him that in his house servants were called help. Very well; next morning the whole house was alarmed by a loud shouting from Dick of 'Help! help! water! help!' In an instant every person in the inn equal to the task rushed into Dick's room with a pail of water. 'I'm much obliged to ye, to be sure,' said Dick, 'but here is more than I want to share with! Shave with! quench mine host, 'you called help and water!' and we thought the house was on fire.' 'Ye told me to call the servant help and d'ye think I would cry water when I meant fire?' 'Give up,' said the landlord, as he led off the line of buckets.

'You have played the duce with my heart,' remarked a gentleman to a young lady who was partner in a game of whist.

'Because you played the knave,' replied the lady smiling.

NEW GOODS, VERY CHEAP. PRATT & SNOW, corner of Young and Wells Streets, one block north of the Temple, Nauvoo, have just received from Boston the largest supply of Dry Goods ever opened in this city, consisting principally of good staple articles for fall and winter: such as Broad-cloths, Casimires, Satinets, Flannels, Shirtings, Sheetings, Calicoes, Boots, Shoes, &c. &c. Cash wanted, and country produce bought and sold.

As we intend selling goods very cheap, and on the principles of honor, justice, and impartiality, no one need ask for credit, nor waste breath in bantering on the price, as we have but one invariable price either for cash or barter.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

CAMPBOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A CURE in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER. This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents,) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

POETRY.

GOD.

O Thou Eternal One! whose presence bright
All space doth occupy—no motion guide—
Unchanged thro' Time's all-revolving flight, Thou only God! There is no God beside.
Being above all beings! Mighty One!
Whom none can comprehend, and none explore—
Who fill'st existence with Thyself alone;
Embracing all—supporting—ruling of—Being whom we call God—know no more.

IN ITS SUBLINE RESEARCH, PHILOSOPHY

May in science, out of the deep—may count
The sand, or the Sun's rays; but God! for Thee
There is no weight nor measure; none can mount
Up to the mysteries. Reason's brightest spark, Though kindled by Thy light, in vain would try
To trace Thy councils, infinite and dark;
And Thou art lost ere thought can soar so high.
Even like past moments in eternity.

Thou, first in primal nothingness, didst call

First, Chaos, then Existence, Lord, on Thee
Eternity had its foundation;
Spring forth from Thee: of Light, Joy, Harmony.
Shine on all life; all beauty, Thine.
Thy word created all and doth create:
The splendor of the sun with rays divine,
Thou art all we see, and shall be glorious;
Life-giving, life-sustaining, Potentate.

Thy chains the unmeasured universe surround

Uplifted by Thee, by Thee inspired with breath;
Thou hast bound us with the end and boundless, and doth create:
As sparks mount upward from the fiery blaze,
So souls are born, so words spring forth from Thee!
And as the sunbeams in the sunny sky
Shine round the silver snow, the pagentry
Of Heaven's bright angels in Thy praise.

Heaven's bright angels in Thy praise

Angels, bright angels in Thy praise,
Wander unnumbered through the blue above;
They own Thy power, accomplish Thy command,
All glory with life, all eloquent with bliss;
What shall we call them? Piles of crystal light?
A glorious company of golden strains,
Lament of celestial ether burning bright,
Sung, lighting systems with their joyous beam,
But Thou, to those art as the moon to night.

Yet as a drop of water in the Sea,

All this magnificence in Thee is lost—
What are a thousand worlds compared to Thee!
And what am I, when Heaven's undimmed host,
Through multiplied by myriads, and arrayed
In all the glory of a sublime thought,
Is but an atom in the balance, weighed Against Thy greatness, in a crystal thought, Against Thy light? What am I then? Nought!

Nought! but the effluence of Thy light divine,

Sweeping worlds, hath reached my bosom too;
Yes, in my spirit doth Thy spirit dwell,
As when the sunbeams in the spirit dwell,
Nought! but I live and on hope's pinions fly,
Eager to see Thy presence; for in Thee
I live, and breathe, and dwell, aspiring high,
Even to the throne of Thy Divinity.
Praise, O God, and Thy Deity must be!

Thou art! direct, guiding all, Thou art!

Direct my understanding to Thee;
Control my spirit, guide my wandering heart;
Though but a mortal, guide me to Thy light,
Still I am something fashioned by Thy hand!
I hold a middle rank, 'twixt Heaven and Earth,
On the last verge of mortal being stand.
Close to the realm where angels have their
birth,
Just on the boundary of the spirit land!

The chain of being is complete in me;

None is matter's last gradation left,
'And the next step is Spirit—Deity!
I can command the lightning, and am dust!
A monarch, and a slave; a worm; a God!
Where, I am I, and how? so marvellous—Conceivable and conceived unknown! This
I am!
Lives swiftly through some higher energy;
For from itself alone it could not be.

Creator! Yes! Thy Wisdom and Thy Word

Created me! Thou source of life and God!
Thou Spirit of my spirit, and my Lord!
Thy Light, Thy Love, and Thy Love's plenitude!
Filled me with an immortal Soul, to spring
Over the abyss of Death, and live a war!
The garments of Eternal Day, and wing
Is heavenly light beyond this little sphere.
Even in its source, O Thee, its Author, Thee.

O thought ineffable! O vision blest!

(Though but a mortal, guide me to Thy light,
Still I am something fashioned by Thy hand!
I hold a middle rank, 'twixt Heaven and Earth,
On the last verge of mortal being stand.
Close to the realm where angels have their
birth,
Just on the boundary of the spirit land!

Thou art! direct, guiding all, Thou art!

Direct my understanding to Thee;
Control my spirit, guide my wandering heart;
Though but a mortal, guide me to Thy light,
Still I am something fashioned by Thy hand!
I hold a middle rank, 'twixt Heaven and Earth,
On the last verge of mortal being stand.
Close to the realm where angels have their
birth,
Just on the boundary of the spirit land!

Thou art! direct, guiding all, Thou art!

Direct my understanding to Thee;
Control my spirit, guide my wandering heart;
Though but a mortal, guide me to Thy light,
Still I am something fashioned by Thy hand!
I hold a middle rank, 'twixt Heaven and Earth,
On the last verge of mortal being stand.
Close to the realm where angels have their
birth,
Just on the boundary of the spirit land!

Thou art! direct, guiding all, Thou art!

Direct my understanding to Thee;
Control my spirit, guide my wandering heart;
Though but a mortal, guide me to Thy light,
Still I am something fashioned by Thy hand!
I hold a middle rank, 'twixt Heaven and Earth,
On the last verge of mortal being stand.
Close to the realm where angels have their
birth,
Just on the boundary of the spirit land!

THE MAMMOTH CAVE.

The mammoth cave in Edmonson county, Kentucky, well deserves to be ranked among those curiosities which by way of distinction have been termed the wonders of the world. Its vast extent it is not easy to ascertain. By far the greatest portion of it has been but recently or within a few years explored, and there is little reason to doubt that very much within its deep and dark recesses, remain yet to be discovered.

The temperature of the air within the cave is uniform being about fifty-degrees, Fahrenheit; and during the summer the air rushes out at the entrance with great force, rendering it extremely uncomfortable to breathe it. Think for a moment of breathing the atmosphere of a warm day, the thermometer up to 85 or 90, and then after a single step, in a moment falling 30 degrees, and you have some idea of the feeling of a visitor about to enter the mammoth cave. To be flooded by a "northwest" while suddenly turning a corner in mid winter, is but a draught through a keyhole in comparison. The chilly feeling however lasts but a short time. As you proceed, you are relieved by exercise and the equable state of the air; and after a while you breathe freer and deeper, and persevere freely or not according to the amount of labor you perform.

For a mile or two the road is plain and good, but there is nothing peculiar worthy of note save the hoppers and tracks of oxen, and of the wheels of wagons employed in the manufacture of saltpetre during the last war. This was a profitable business for a time, but its expense and difficulty of procuring potash, and the necessity of carrying on much of the operation outside, put an end to it.

The houses erected for the invalids who thought the air of the cave beneficial, are still standing—monuments of the tenacity with which mortality clings to life, and of the vain expedients which man will seek after to escape the unalterable decree of his Creator. If to improve the appetite were to cure the consumption, these patients might have recovered. They lived well as far as comestibles could serve them. Good venison and chafing dishes to do it; good wine that needed no bush; and all that the good taste and enterprise of the host could furnish, were at their call; but no consumption was, as far as we know, permanently relieved.

After leaving these, various wonderful scenes are encountered: a description of which would require a good sized volume. Vast and majestic domes, avenues extending some miles, caves above and beneath, and pits of immense depth, begin to impress upon the visitor some idea of the grandeur and sublimity of the place. The passage over what is called the Bottomless Pit, is made safe by a bridge about four feet high and ten feet long. At the end of the bridge is a ladder which you descend to reach the other side. In this pit, at the depth of about 75 feet you find water, but its lowest depth is not known.

Near this is the Winding Way, an extremely narrow passage, apparently cut out of the rock. For a distance of about 100 yards the opening is not much more than a foot wide, and about four feet in height. You work your passage through, however, with little trouble, and presently emerge into an immense space both in height and width.

Now you approach the rivers. The first, (river Styx) can be passed by going round instead of crossing it. The second is called Lake Lethe, about ten or twelve feet wide. This crossed by means of boats, and the distance from one landing to the other, is perhaps 150 or 200 yards. The river Jordan is the last and largest. Upon this you travel about half a mile, a small part of the way under a ceiling so low as to make it necessary to stoop in the boat. Another name for this is the Echo river; a report of a pistol on this stream is a most deafening, and the solemn stillness when all on board are quiet is indescribable. These rivers rise and fall with Green river, which must of course supply them with water. There are fish here in considerable numbers, but small fish and a small fish about the size of a large minnow are the principal varieties. The latter are of a very light delicate pink color, almost transparent. They live but a short time after being taken out of the cave waters, but the most singular thing about them is their total want of anything like an eye.

At Lake Lethe the distance to the surface of the earth above, it is said, has been ascertained to be 300 feet. At the foot of a ladder ascending through a fissure in the rock to "Martha's Vineyard," and the route onward, is a series of delightful water, cool and refreshing. Still higher by a very steep and difficult ascent of perhaps 30 or 40 feet is the "Holy Sepulchre." From the roof of this hang like icicles in great quantities beautiful stalactites, curious and magical. These are some of the countless varieties of carbonate of lime abounding in this region of the cave, and have been formed by the filtration of water through the pores of the rocks.

Beyond this for a mile or two, may be found curiosities wonderful and beautiful formations in such rich and rare profusion as to delight and astonish. Upon the roof and sides of the cave are formations of gypsum, of the most perfect and delicate patterns, outlying in appearance the finest sculpture, and resembling roses and flowers of various shapes. Besides these recent formations, which are all of the most spotless white, there is a place called the Snowball Chamber, the ceiling of which is studded with formations exactly resembling snow balls. When illuminated with one of the "Bengal lights," this room presents a magnificent spectacle.

One might spend several days in this part of the cave without being weary of examining the wonders and the beauties which are above, around, and in the very pathway.

Farther on the "Rocky Mountains," a vast collection of broken rocks, of a quarter of a mile perhaps in extent, rising rugged and steep like an Alpine barrier as it were to any further progress. The size of these stones (not being generally very large) and the immense piles make these mountains a matter of no little curiosity. After reaching the top you are within a stone's throw of Serena's Arbor, situated in Dismal Hollow, at the extreme end of the cave, and eleven miles from the entrance. The curiosities in the Arbor are the stalactites, which are formations of the same character as the stalactites, but instead of being pendent from the roof, rise up from the floor. They also are formed by dropping of calcareous matter.

Although this is called the end of the cave, yet there is a branch running nearly parallel a considerable distance, and it is moreover the termination of, but one stretch. It is all too, a deviation from what is called the main cave which may be explored to an extent nearly as far, but in which there is not much to attract.

These eleven miles may be travelled, going and coming, making twenty two miles with as little fatigue as one fifth the distance outside the cave.

A whole week might be spent in exploring this vast cavern, and still wonders be passed unseen; but little therefore in the way of description could be expected in the limits of a newspaper article. It must be seen to be understood and appreciated.

In the formation of the cave, it is very evident, that water was an all powerful agent. In many places, the rocks have been worn by water, grooved out and rounded to such an extent as to lead one to suppose that long ages had been occupied in the great work.

The cave is the property of Dr. Croghan, a brother of the hero of Fort Stephenson. He takes great pleasure in his possession as he well may. He prizes it highly and will doubtless spare no pains or expense in providing facilities for the thorough exploration by visitors of all the labyrinths of this mammoth wonder.

THE PROGRESS OF ETHNOLOGY.

At the late meeting of the New York Historical Society, on the 21st of October, J. R. Bartlett, Esq., read the following paper:

"The science of Ethnology, of the progress of which we propose to give some account this evening, is probably new to many present. A definition of the word may not therefore be improper.

Ethnology or Ethnography is that branch of human knowledge which illustrates and defines the origin and history of nations—the physical character of the different races of men—their varieties in color and conformation—the affinities of their language—their national peculiarities—their knowledge of the arts—their government and laws, and their manners and customs. It is by a close study of those that we are enabled to trace the origin of the various races of men by which the globe is peopled.

The means which have been the most available, and which are the most certain in uniting the links which connect the varieties of men, is language. This, rather than complexion or physical organization, is the most unfailing test; and since its application to the subject, more has been accomplished than had been effected for centuries by all other means combined.

Ethnology is at present receiving great attention throughout the civilized world, and a brief mention of the names of the distinguished men who have contributed by their works, to the advancement of the science, and those at present engaged in promoting it, will be sufficient for our purpose. In England, Dr. Pritchard ranks first. His splendid works on the Natural and Physical History of Man, have laid open a new field of research, and his deductions, which tend to prove the unity of our race, are of the greatest interest and importance. Mr. Wilson, the Sanscrit Professor at Oxford University, by his dictionaries and grammars of the Sanscrit language, and his researches into the history of nations which occupy India and Central Asia, has contributed greatly to the advancement of this science. An important contribution has also been made to the Ethnology of Egypt by Sir Gardner Wilkinson, whose interesting work on the Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians has elucidated that subject in the most perfect manner; showing to the world that, along the banks of the Nile, centuries before any European nation had its birth, nearly all the arts of which we have any knowledge were known.

In France the labors of Humboldt, Champollion, De Sacy, Babel, Eichen, and others, are too well known to need any remarks from us. In Germany more has been accomplished than in either England or France. It would occupy more time than is allotted to us, merely to give a sketch of the immense labors and splendid results of the German savans, in revealing to the world what had been wrapped in obscurity for ages. They seem unwilling to look at anything embraced in our ideas of antiquity, but extended their scrutinizing researches far back into that primeval period of which history has scarcely kept a record—to nations which exist but in name, the only remains of whose existence are in some mutilated and crumbling marbles, or some strange and undeciphered inscription. The mysterious characters which are found on the ruined heaps of Babylon, Nineveh, and Persepolis, have yielded to their rigid scrutiny; and we are now enabled to read the records of the conquests of Xerxes and Darius and Artaxerxes on the monuments and edifices which they themselves erected. In deciphering the ancient inscriptions of Arabia and Northern Africa, they have been equally successful; and at the present moment they are accomplishing more in Egypt than all who have preceded them.

In Germany the science of Ethnology received its first impulse; consequently we find here more who have distinguished themselves in this science, and that of Philology, which is intimately connected with it, than in any other country. The Mithridates of Adelung and Vater was the first work of importance—this was a most laborious undertaking, and gave the world's prayer in five hundred languages; it was well known to all students by his many Philological works, and perhaps no one has contributed more as far as language is concerned; Professor Bopp, one of the most remarkable linguists of Europe, who has thrown great light on Ethnographic subjects, by his familiarity with the Sanscrit and other oriental languages; Grotefend, who discovered the key to the arrow-headed characters of Babylonia; Ritter, by his great work on the Geography and Ethnography of Asia; Lassen, by his various philological researches; and Lepsius, who is at present at the head of the scientific expedition sent to Egypt by the King of Prussia.

We have prepared a hasty sketch of what has lately been accomplished in various parts of the world for the promotion of Ethnology; but in this we can only speak of results, as time and the broad space before us will not permit of giving details. Among the European nations, England, France, Prussia, and Russia have scientific expeditions in distant parts of the world, engaged in the investigation of subjects directly connected with Ethnology; and our own exploring expedition has been as much occupied in inquiries relating to the people inhabiting the islands of the South Seas, as in those relating to Natural Science or Geography. Details of this expedition are looked for with great curiosity and interest, and it is to be hoped that the information collected may be laid before the world before other nations, who have sent expeditions over the same regions, forestall us by their publications. It is stated in the newspapers, by the late arrival from England, that Captain Ross has just returned from his voyage for the exploration of the South Antarctic regions after an absence of four years; and that he asserts for himself a priority of discovery of several lands which Lieut. Wilkes claims to have first visited. He also depreciates very much the results which our own expedition accomplished. It is, therefore, important that the American government should use dispatch in bringing out the account of the discoveries effected by the gentleman.

Among the contributions of the science of Ethnology by our own countrymen, and which tend to elucidate the origin and history of the Aborigine races of this continent, we must mention the Cranium Americana of Dr. Morton, of Philadelphia—a work of great research and importance, as it enables us, by making craniological comparisons of the various Indian tribes of our northern and southern hemispheres, to arrive at conclusions as to the identity of the races. The labors of Messrs. Stephens and Catherwood in Yucatan and Central America, have thrown a new light on a portion of our country's history, which only increases our desire to know more of the interesting people, who have left so many splendid monuments of their greatness. Another important contribution to American Ethnology, and one on which more labor has been bestowed than on any other, is that of our worthy President—the Synopsis of the Indian Tribes of North America, with comparative tables of vocabularies and select sentences.

This work has most satisfactorily settled the question as to the identity of the principal Indian tribes north of Mexico and east of the Rocky Mountains, and forms a substantial basis on which future philologists may extend their investigations. The History of the Red Race, by Mr. Bradford, is another work which displays much original research, and throws additional light on the history of our aboriginal nations. A vast deal is yet to be accomplished in this field, and it is to be hoped that an effort will be made to rescue from oblivion the monuments that yet remain in various parts of our country, of the existence of a great race of people, who are fast perishing. Every year these relics become less—the mounds and earth-works of the west are levelled as the settlements are extended, and a few years will suffice, to destroy those interesting memorials of a great and powerful nation.

Few, perhaps, are aware that M. Castelnau, a French gentleman, has been travelling for the last five years, through North America, on a scientific exploration, from which he returned to Paris during the past year. He made extensive collections in Natural History, which were presented to the Garden of Plants. To the Paris Academy of Natural Sciences, he made a communication on some geological revolutions within the limits of our own territories. M. Castelnau supposes that the vast prairies of our western region are formed of a deep alluvial soil, covering an old calcareous soil, they were once covered with water. That, at some remote period, there was some obstruction in the course of the Mississippi, which produced a stagnation of its waters, and which raised them to an elevation of 40 metres, (130 feet); for, wherever the rocks present an abrupt front toward the river, they offer a series of parallel lines, inclining slightly toward the north. Lake Superior, he thinks, formerly discharged itself into Lake Michigan, which had its termination in an immense basin, to which he gives the name of Lake Silurian, and which probably discharged the excess of its contents into the Gulf of Mexico; but a revolution of nature checked the passage of the waters to the extremity of Lake Michigan, and produced at Lake Superior the rising ground known as the Illinois, which must have been of greater extent than it is now; and it is not impossible that, with its progressive depression, the waters will, at some distant period, resume their former course.

M. Castelnau's travels, and the result of his inquiries, are now in the course of publication; and as soon as they are published, the author will embark for South America for the purpose of exploring the unknown regions in which the numerous branches of the Amazon have their respective sources. He will proceed from Rio Janeiro across the continent to Lima, and return to the Amazon. This is the expedition alluded to in the newspapers, which was planned by the late Duke of Orleans, and which is now to be carried into effect, by order of the French government, under the special patronage of the Duc de Nemours.

Herr Geofroi M. Uhde has lately returned to (Heidelberg) Germany, from Mexico, where he has spent twenty-three years, in historic and archaeological researches, and made a large collection of Mexican antiquities. They consist of arms, armor, fishing implements, implements of the chase, and of various trinkets, agricultural and musical instruments, vases, cups, lamps, engraved stones, sculptured figures, models of houses and boats, female ornaments in gold and silver, &c., and including some valuable additions to the mass of evidence, which goes to establish the ancient relations of the other continents with the new world. Among these, the most remarkable is a series of fifty two vases, in baked clay, from a foot to a foot and a half in height, greatly resembling the Etruscan vases, and covered with a strange mixture of figures, representing Divinities—Greek, Roman, Egyptian, and Indian. The graven stones, the subjects of which are, for the most part, birds, insects, and flowers, show, it is said, that the art of engraving had reached a high degree of perfection among the Mexicans. The female ornaments, though rude in form, are of very delicate execution, scarcely inferior, in that respect, to the best English and French productions of their class. The collection contains, also, two xylographic plates, similar to those from which the Chinese print their books, but of which the characters are, unfortunately injured, and some of them nearly effaced; and an illustrated manuscript, in Mexican characters, on a sort of pasteboard, about the thickness of the finger. Of these subjects, Mr. Uhde is engaged in preparing a digested catalogue for publication. (Lond. Ath., Aug. 1842, p. 713.)

A work will shortly appear on Mexico by M. Mayer, of Baltimore, secretary of the American legation. This gentleman paid much attention to the existing antiquities of the country, and has discovered some curious relics, which bear a close affinity to those found by Messrs. Stephens and Catherwood in Yucatan, than any yet found. The character of the monuments of Yucatan and Mexico is quite dissimilar, but there cannot be a doubt but that a closer investigation will prove their identity.

Egypt continues to be the land of wonders, and attracts to its venerable monuments the learned of all nations. The magnificent work by the savans who accompanied Napoleon, and which was published under his auspices, was thought to embrace all that could be said upon that country. But France has contributed another work equally important, by the lamented Champollion; and when we close this list with the splendid work by Rosellini, under the patronage of the Tuscan government, which embraces all the recent discoveries in Egyptian archaeology and hieroglyphics, we must acknowledge that no part of the world has been more thoroughly investigated and described. Yet, we have to announce a new scientific commission, sent to the land of the Pharaohs by that patron of learning, the King of Prussia. At its head is placed Dr. Lepsius, one of the most distinguished philologists and antiquarians of Europe.

Paying for a Spree.—The following is a literal copy of a bill presented to a crowd lately at one of the large hotels in a Western city. He was one of a party of some half a dozen sojourning together, all chuck full of divinity,

Mr.—	To—Hotel, Dr.
To boarding 9 days,	$13 50
Wines,	140 00
Broken glass,	39 50
Getting all the bed cords in the house,	50 00
Kicking in panels and breaking locks,	75 00
Insults on waiters, $10 each, black eyes and doctor's bills included,	40 00
Cocktails before breakfast, sent to rooms,	7 50
Sundries at bar,	34 00
Astral lamps, looking glasses, &c., broken by firing pistols at them,	375 00
Bell cracked by being rung furiously in the night,	30 00
Extra shins generally,	50 00

A Yankee Estimate of Marriage.—They said marrying was fun—pretty (un-to-be sure). When I was a single man the world wagged about well enough. It was just like an omnibus. I was a passenger, paid my levy, and hadn't more to do with it than to sit down, and care not a button for anything. Spousing the omnibus got upset, well I walks off; and leaves the man to pick up the pieces. But then I takes a wife, and he hanged to me—It's all very well for a while; but plaguy like owing an upset omnibus. What did I get by it?—How much fun? What a jawing old woman and those squallers. Mighty different from courtin'. Instead of Yes my duck, No my dear, As you please, honey, and When you like, lovely, like what it was in courtin' time, it's a reg'lar row. Sour looks and cold potatoes. Children and table cloths badly off for soap, always darning and mending, and nothing ever darned or mended. If it wasn't that I am particularly sober I'd be inclined to drink. My house ain't my own, my money ain't my own, I belong to four people beside myself, the old woman and three children, I'm in partnership concern, and so many has got their fingers in that I must bust up. I'll break, and sign over the trade to you.—Sam Slick.

The Scotch Church—Riots in Scotland.—The opposition to the installation of the newly-appointed ministers of the Church of Scotland, to supply the place of those who have seceded, is so violent in Ross-shire, that 203 troops have been ordered to that county.

Field Preaching.—We have heard of a friendly farmer in the west, who, in gratitude to God for the abundant harvest, has arranged the stacks in his stack-yard in a circle, so that the sheltered space within may accommodate the Free Church of his parish. Scottish Guardian.

A Steamer without a chimney.—Steamer Princeton.—Much has been said by the New York press in favor of this new frigate. They consider her one of the swiftest vessels of her class ever upon the ocean. She has no paddles at the sides, but what is still more remarkable, she has no smoke pipe. In his most arduous trials of the importance and success of steam boats, both upon the rivers and the seas, Fulton never even suggested that they should be built and used without a chimney.

SILK CULTURE.

In our last, we promised to give, in this number, some information relative to the silk culture. And we cannot perhaps, better fulfil that promise than by copying from the proceedings of a meeting of Silk growers, held in Rochester, N. Y., during the recent State Fair in that city. The primary object of the meeting was, to collect and impart information on the culture and manufacture of Silk.

We extract from the proceedings, (as published in the 'New Genesee Farmer,') only such portions as we think will most interest our readers:

Much interesting information was elicited. Several of the persons present had been engaged six, seven, and eight years in the business, with varied success. The amount of cocoons raised this year by those present, as near as could be ascertained, was 2,150 pounds.

The experience and opinions given were very discrepant as to the value of the Mullein for feeding; some considering it as absolutely good for nothing, some as profitable only in the first stages of the worm, and others believing it little inferior to any other tree, provided it be properly cultivated and fed. But all were unanimous as to the superiority of the White Mulberry, and that, when it could be had, it should always be used after the last moulting.

But the subject that most engrossed and interested the meeting, was the causes of disease, especially in the last stage of the worm. So varied and complex, however, were the circumstances under which diseases and consequent failure had occurred in the experience of different individuals, that no very satisfactory conclusion could be arrived at, as to the true cause or causes of disease. One gentleman was very confident that he could always arrest disease by clearing off the litter and sick worms. Another was equally confident, that even then, too high a temperature, when the worm was large and about to wind, would cause certainly produce sickness, as uncleanliness. The prevalent opinion seemed to be, that filth, too many worms in a given space, want of ventilation, and too high a temperature, one or all combined, were the usual causes of disease. Of course the appropriate remedies were obvious. The discussion of these topics being continued to a late hour, the meeting adjourned to 1 o'clock, P. M., on the 21st, to one of the tents on the ground occupied by the State Fair.

Sept. 21. Met pursuant to adjournment; when it was

Resolved, That, from the experience of the members of this meeting, we have every inducement to proceed in the prosecution of the culture of silk.

SILK.—Silk is spun by the larvae of caterpillars belonging to different species of Phalena. It forms the ball, or cocoon, in which the silk-worm envelops itself in passing to the chrysalis state. The fibre which constitutes this ball is so small, that a single thread, when unwound, is often twelve hundred yards in length. The original threads are too fine for manufacturing purposes, and therefore, in winding or reeling them off from the cocoons, the ends or threads of several cocoons are joined together, and reeled out of warm water, which softens their natural gummy covering, and causes them to cohere into a single thread. Silk, as it is spun by the animal, is of a color varying from white to reddish yellow. Its texture is very strong and elastic. It communicates to water a mucilaginous character, owing to the solution of its gummy part, but the silk itself is insoluble in water or alcohol. [The Useful Arts.]

Cranberries.—This pleasant fruit is now received in large quantities from the West. The crops at the East are said to have been cut off in a great measure by frost, and the market is now supplied by the westward; and no doubt Michigan cranberries will be eaten in the very head quarters of cranberries, Barnstable, Mass. We had no idea, until to day, of the quantity sold in this city. One house in Front street, sold within a few days, 250 barrels, received from Michigan, at $6 and $6 50 per bbl., and have had application for more than they can supply. Of the same lot, 3000 bbls. went over the western railroad to Boston, and were there sold as soon as received. [N. Y. Tribune.]

FARMERS' ERRORS AND DELUSIONS.

[Under this caption a correspondent of the New Genesee Farmer gives the subjoined essay. Though designed for Western New York we think its contents are equally appropriate to, and for, this meridian. —Editor.]

Mr. Batchelor.—You ask in the Jun. Farmer, 'What can be done for the benefit of Agriculture in Western New York?' I reply, that the stern necessity of the times has at length taught farmers a lesson, which they have long and pertinaciously resisted—to wit, that they can no longer look to legislative action to bring back those high prices which enabled them to riot in idle waste during the palmy days of the paper bubble.

Every farmer, who makes use of his common sense, now relies on himself, and Providence, for all the positive benefits he is to receive. But there is still one obstacle in the way of the prosperity of farmers in a class—

They cannot see, and will not learn. Ask a farmer if he takes an agricultural paper—nine times out of ten he will say 'No; I hate book farming.' If perchance you ask the tenth man if he has read a certain article in his last paper, he will reply in the negative, saying, 'I did not get my paper from the office until last week.' Now what would a poor New York farmer who reads his paper daily, say if he should be told that it took a farmer—in sovereign of Western New York—two weeks to read his 'little monthly sheet'? But ask this same farmer if he has planted his potatoes, and he will say 'No, I am waiting for the new of the moon.' Here, says I to myself, 'is the legitimate fruit of that stolid ignorance which eschews common sense to seize upon the marvellous.' Ask this man, in the fall, if he has potatoes to sell; he will tell you that the season was too dry for his crop to yield well. The crust on his skull is impenetrable—he still hugs the marvellous. Had he planted earlier, and let the moon alone, he would have had the benefit of the early summer rains, and a good crop; here is labor and capital not merely transferred, but sacrificed to Juggernaut.

It is not many days since I saw a farmer, with three full grown boys, hauling and spreading his barn yard manure upon his wheat fallow. I asked him why he did not haul out his manure in the winter, on a sled, and put it on his corn field; as it would thus do more good, and save the hard work in hot weather. He replied, that corn was of no consequence; that the climate did not suit corn like Jersey, &c. I asked him if he ever knew corn to fail in a well manured garden. This was an experiment he had never tried, nor did he care to try it. I asked him why he spread his manure in the hot sun, to lose its gases in the air. He said because it would be better for the wheat. Here the man spoke wisely; for I have no doubt had this rank manure been kept off the fallow altogether the first crop, at least, would have filled the better for it. 'Here,' said I to myself, 'is labor and capital lost, by besotted, obstinate ignorance.'

When I hear a farmer complain that his wheat is winter-killed, I ask him why he did not plough it in, so that the ridges and big lumps thrown up by the plough may be slacked down by the frost upon the roots of the wheat. He will reply, that it is too much work to plough the wheat. Such a man evidently trusts to Providence for a favorable season; but Providence requires works, no less than faith.

How many farmers might save themselves both hard work and capital by fall plowing, by raising the same quantity of corn on two acres that they generally receive from six acres. 'Tis true, that in the fall the days are short, and farmers have much to do; but what land will not pay, in its products alone, for good tillage. I find it is those farmers who never have anything to sell from their farms who complain most of the cost of help, and their inability to obtain it: 'tis after the crib and pork barrels are exhausted that help deserts the farm.'

How many farmers go to the flour mills and buy wheat shorts for feed, that are so exhausted of the flour as hardly to blanch a black coat, promising to pay a great price for the same after harvest! How much easier, and more respectable, could a farmer raise the same amount of feed on a few rods of his half tilled farm, planted with Indian corn! What can excuse such rural economy?

I knew a farmer who last year put all his manure on five acres of corn ground. He got 50 bushels of corn to the acre, and stalks enough to winter his cattle. He can now take $100 for the flax and flax seed on the same lot when harvested. In the fall it will be sown with wheat and seeded with clover in the spring. This farmer says, that an old ward may sometimes do for corn, but that long manure never fails. He says that green manure applied to a wheat fallow is very bad farming.

CORNSTALK MOLASSES.

We acknowledge the receipt of a bottle of what we should have pronounced, had we not been informed to the contrary, first quality Sugar House Molasses, it having the appearance of that article. It was manufactured from corn-stalks, by James S. Pope, Esq., an enterprising farmer and planter of this District, who has spared neither time nor expense in bringing to perfection an experiment which has so often been tried, but we have never heard of its having been brought to so successful an issue, in this District. We wish him success in his future experiments. The following explanatory note accompanied the bottle of molasses:—[Edgefield Advertiser.]

Mr. F. W. DUBOIS.—Dear Sir: I take the liberty of requesting you to publish for the information of the public, an experiment which I have lately made in extracting syrup from the corn-stalk. I allotted about seventy hills square for my experiment, from which I made about twenty-five gallons of syrup. I present you with a specimen, which will enable you to judge of its quality. I deferred too long in stripping the shoot from the stalk. I think that if the shoot had been stripped in time, the yield would have been increased. I am inclined to think that an acre, if in a high state of improvement, and well cultivated, can be made to yield, at least, seventy-five gallons. The corn should be drilled, and the drills about three feet apart. Planting in this manner, will prevent the corn from shooting, (so it is said,) and will enable the stalk to retain the juice. It is evident that the shoot should not be permitted to remain on the stalk until the grain begins to form.

Yours &c.

JAMES S. POPE.

TO DAY COWS INTENDED FOR FATTENING.—Take an ounce of powdered alum, boil it in two quarts of milk till it turns to whey; then boil in this whey a large handful of sage, till it is reduced to one quart; rub the udder with a little of it, and give her the rest to drink. First milk her clean, and afterwards draw a little milk every second day, least the udder become overcharged. Repeat the dose and operation if necessary. —Monk's Ag. Dictionary.

THE MECHANIC.—The following beautiful article is from 'The Carpenter of Rouen,' a popular play:

The Mechanic, sir, is one of God's noblemen. What have mechanics not done? Have they not opened the secret chambers of the mighty deep, and extracted its treasures, and made the raging billows their highway on which they ride as on a tame steed? Are not the elements of fire and water chained to the crank, and at the mechanic's bidding compelled to turn it? Have not the mechanics opened the bowels of the earth, and made its products contribute to their wants? The forked lightning is their plaything, and they ride triumphant on the wings of the mighty winds. To the wise they are floodgates of knowledge, and the kings and queens are decorated with their handiworks. He who made the Universe was the first Mechanic.

GREAT MILKER.—A Durham cow, owned by Cyrus P. Smith, Brooklyn, N. Y., gave from 32 to 34 quarts of milk daily, for twenty days, commencing seven days after calving. This was in September. For three months in succession, she gave not less than 32 quarts per day. For ten months she gave an average of 27 quarts per day. Besides hay and grass in their season, she was fed on ground corn and oats, meal, ship-stuff and carrots, sugar beets and potatoes; changing the feed once a week, as it was found that on any one course of feed more than a week, the quantity of milk diminished, and by a change it increased. —[Selected.]

HOG POISONED BY TOBACCO.—A correspondent of the Maine Farmer, says he lately lost one of his best hogs, a very fine one, by its having accidental access to, and eating a few stems of tobacco, which had been boiled for the purpose of making a liquor to destroy lice on the animal. The effect was extensive swelling of the intestines, and then of the whole system, with speedy mortification. Tobacco stems are frequently boiled for the purpose indicated, and great caution should be used in disposing of them.

Water pipes of thick glass are now used in Paris to convey water through the city. They are coated with bitumen, and inserted in each other at the ends with bitumen joints. It is said they will bear a much greater pressure than cast iron, and are thirty per cent cheaper.

CURIOUS RESULT.—A friend has shown to us some scions, which he has just received from a gentleman on Grand Isle, Vt., which produce apples partly sweet and partly sour. This singular production was brought about in this manner. A bud was taken from an apple-tree producing sour fruit, another from one producing sweet; the two buds were neatly cut into halves, and a half of each kind joined together, forming a bud which was inserted in the stock as usual.

We have often heard of this method of producing two distinct varieties of fruit in the same apple, but we have doubted it, and though our information appears to come now from a very respectable source, we are rather incredulous, though such a thing may be possible. It is easily tested, and we hope the point will be settled. Our friend thinks to test it by getting the two kinds of fruit from the scions sent him, but whatever fruit they may produce will prove nothing, unless there is proof of their origin. We have seen of natural fruit, sweet and sour fruit in the same apple. We advise him to be thorough in his experiment, and begin with the bud. —[Southern Cultivator.]

[For the Neighbor.]

MR. EDITOR:—Sir: Permit me through the medium of your valuable paper to drop a few remarks regarding the cord wainers of this place. All people are commanded to come here by special revelation from the most high God, and thousands have come here expecting to find an inheritance amongst the righteous. I am aware that those who come here have trials and difficulties of a complicated nature to endure; but when these things come from want of policy it makes them more hard to endure, so it is with the cord wainers of this place; they come to Nauvoo in the first place, to obey the requirements of the Great Jehovah; the next duty is to find out a location; this being done, they begin to think about employment. Here comes the dilemma. Alas! employment is not to be had, and what is the reason? The reason is this, because the merchants and moneyed men of this place bring in the Eastern Boots and Shoes which can be sold at a cheaper rate than they can be manufactured here. How then are we to get along? becomes a question that this community ought to think about in order that they may have a share of the necessities and comforts of life. If the moneyed men of this city, who are so zealous in spending their money and their time going to the East and bringing on these cheap Boots and Shoes, if they would stay at home and manifest the same zeal, take the same interest, in establishing home manufacture, not only in leather but in many other things, more good would be done, the community be cheaper and better served; yes, and more than this; the money would be kept amongst ourselves, and the employed shoemakers would have plenty to do, if these things were attended to in a proper manner and as they ought to be; it would produce peace, joy and comfort in many a domestic circle, and dispel the dark forebodings of a dreary winter. Let any thinking mind consider and reflect upon this body of tradesmen, those especially who have wives and families! Here they are deprived in a great measure of the means of obtaining a livelihood for the support of their wives and families. Left, as it were, in the midst of abundance, to drag out a miserable existence!—ought such things to be in the city of our God? Some may say we are well off. All I would say to such individuals is, that I wish they had a trial of our circumstances and they would perhaps think otherwise; and now I would say in conclusion, let these Eastern Boots and Shoes be banished from our city and let us manufacture our own leather, and let us have it at the Eastern prices and then we can supply the citizens of this place with their own material and then would trouble and expenses cease.

Yours truly,

ROBERT HAMILTON.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, NOV. 29, 1843.

WOOD! WOOD!!

WE would respectfully notify those who have promised us wood, that we are in want of it; and if they are as willing to fulfil as they were to make promises, we shall be supplied with an abundance of this indispensable article soon.

Persons wishing to become subscribers to the Times and Seasons, or Neighbor, can now have the opportunity of doing so by leaving their names at our office, and forwarding the amount in wood.

Also, Pork, Flour, Corn meal, Potatoes and most kinds of grain, taken on subscription.

TAYLOR & WOODRUFF.

We see that a number of our citizens are forming a Lyceum in our city, to continue during the fall and winter months. This, if properly conducted, which from what we learn, we believe will to the case, will prove advantageous to many of our young gentlemen who wish to improve in public speaking.

At all events, we wish those engaged in it much success; and while they occasionally travel over the smooth and animating fields of oratory, if they here and there encounter impediments in the complicated theories of rhetoric, let them remember that the celebrated Demosthenes, while practicing alone upon the beach by the thundering ocean,

Encountered impediments too.

Slaves.—The King of Sweden has ordered to be laid before the next Assembly of the Estates a plan for the emancipation of the slaves in the Island of St. Bartholomew. The number of slaves in the Island is 595, and it is estimated that about $100,000 will indemnify their owners if they are freed.

The Art of Printing.—The invention of printing is indeed the noblest acquisition of science; it is the impregnable fortress of civilization, no political changes, no physical vicissitudes, no mutation short of complete extinction of mankind, can henceforth restore the empire of the world to ignorance.

The newspapers are all scratching away at Puseyism. We believe it is a clause in the Episcopal Church cat-achism that has offered them such a cat-alogue of a-mess-mess. It is obvious to the most pusey-lanious, that if the Bishops do not puse in the course they have been pursuing, they will bring upon the Church a cat-castrophe that will overwhelm it like a cat-actrac. —[Hagerstown (Md.) News.]

'Ah, Eliza!' said a pusey preacher to a young lady who had just been making her hair into beautiful ringlets. 'Ah, Eliza!' had God intended your locks to be curled, he would have curled them for you. 'When I was an infant,' returned the damsel, 'he did; but now I am grown up, he thinks I am able to do it myself.'

Changing one's mind.—'Maint I see you home from meeting, Eunice?' said a Yankee to a girl whom he kinder, sorter had a feeling for. 'No you shan't do no such thing. I'm otherwise engaged.' 'Well, I guess you've missed it once—' 'I've got my pockets chuck full of ginger-bread and ammons.' 'You may take my arm, Ruben.' —[Piscataway.]

A Home Thrust.—The Rev. Rowland Hill was celebrated for his talents, his boldness, his piety, and his conscientiousness. He would never suppress his feelings or modify his language, through fear of giving offence, and was never known to omit an opportunity of illustrating a sentiment, or administering a deserved reproof, however embarrassing it might prove to individuals who might happen to be present. It is related of this good, but eccentric preacher, that on one occasion when speaking of the sin attendant upon dress, and conformity to all the fashionable fooleries of the day, he observed:

I am well aware that many of you are ready to say—'Mr. Hill look at home, look at your own wife!' It is all true, look at her. There she is, and then applying himself to her, in the presence of the congregation he said with astonishing effect. You know, Mrs. Hill, I have often pointed out to you the sin and folly of pursuing extravagance when you could relieve so many of your fellow creatures, in place of wasting your money in this way.

It is said a man down east has invented a machine to renovate old bachelors. It is said that out of a good sized, fat, greasy old bachelor he can make quite a nice young man, and have enough left to make two small puppies, a pair of leather breeches, and a small kettle of soft soap.

Arrest of Counterfeits.—The Louisville Dime of the 2d inst. says: Officers Ronald and Gilmore, succeeded yesterday in arresting an old and notorious band of counterfeiters, under the following circumstances:

A few days since the gang passed down the river, stopping a short time at Jeffersonville. Our Officers followed in pursuit and overtook them five miles this side of Hawesville, where they arrested them and brought them back to the city. Their names, as near as we can learn them, are Garrison and his wife, a man by the name of Towsey, and a person called Rand. In their possession was found about $8000 in counterfeit on various Banks. Garrison's wife said the money belonged to her. It was tied up with a quantity of lead, intending to sink it if surprised, but our indefatigable Officers were too quick for them. Towsey is an old scoundrel as is his comrade Garrison. Towsey was a witness for the notorious Kohoo who forfeited his bail at the last term of the Circuit Court. We understand that he came very near escaping this time. Their examination takes place this morning. Officers Ronald and Gilmore deserve much credit for their efficiency on this occasion.

An Upright Judge.—The following proceedings are reported in an Illinois Criminal Court.—The presiding Judge had been appointed to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Judge Lynch.

Court.—Sam, said the Judge, I suppose you know the jury have brought you in guilty of murder.

Prisoner.—Yes, Judge, that are a fact, no mistake.

C.—Well Sam, you will have to be hanged, you know.

P.—Yes, I suppose so.

C.—No help for it, I believe. Have you any choice about the time, Sam?

P.—No, I believe not; it don't make much difference, if I have got to be hanged, when it is done. I have had a midlin' hard time all my life, any how. This is no great things of a world, Judge, you know yourself.

Mr. Sheriff. said the judge, will this day four weeks come on Sunday?

No, sir, said the Sheriff, that can't be possible.

You had better look at the Almanack, said the Judge—I don't wish to make any judicious mistake.

Having become satisfied that the hanging day would come round at a proper period, if calculated by weeks, he proceeded to inquire if that day four weeks would suit Sam as well as any other to be hanged on. He was assured that any day except Friday, which was an unlucky day, would be perfectly agreeable.

Now, Sam, said his honor, have you any thing to say why sentence of death should not be pronounced upon you?

Not much, was the reply; if I owe any body, I forgive the debt; and if any body owes me any thing, they may pay it to my wife, and may God have mercy on your soul, said the judge, and he burst into a flood of tears.

Sam was subsequently hanged, according to appointment. Ex. paper.

Anecdote.—The following anecdote is related in the Evangelical Magazine:—An African preacher speaking from What is a man profited if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? mentioned that among other things, many lost their souls by being too charitable! Seeing the congregation astonished beyond measure at his saying it, he very emphatically repeated it, and then proceeded to explain his meaning. Many people, said he, attend meetings, hear the sermon, and when it is over, they proceed to divide it out among the congregation, that part was for that man, that part for that woman, and such denunciations were for such persons; those threats for you sinners; and so, continued the shrewd African, they give away the whole sermon and keep none for themselves. —[Norwalk Gazette.]

A Fish running away with a Vessel.—The Philadelphia Exchange Books of the 15th instant recorded the following extraordinary circumstance:—

On the 22d of August the brig Rowena was lying in Laguna roads, the weather perfectly calm. I discovered the vessel moving slowly about among the shipping. I could not conceive what could be the matter. I ordered to heave in, to see if the anchor is gone, but it was not, and to my surprise, I found a tremendous monster entangled fast to the buoy rope, and moving the anchor slowly along the bottom. I then had the fish towed on shore. It was of a flatish shape, something like a devil fish, but of a very curious shape, being wider than it was long, and having two tusks, one on each side of the mouth, and a very small tail in proportion to the fish, exactly like a cat's tail. The tail can be seen on board the brig Rowena. The dimensions of the fish were as follows. Length from the end of the tail to the end of the tusks 18 feet, from wing to wing, 20 feet, the mouth, 4 feet, and its weight 3500 lbs.

Natural Curiosity.—Last week, while the workmen of Mr. Robert Harvey, mahogany merchant, Stockwell street, Glasgow, were cutting a log of Honduras, of about 10 feet long, and 23 inches in diameter, they were surprised to find, in the very center of the otherwise excellent piece of wood, about thirteen feet from the root, a hollow of 4 feet long by 9 inches wide, and tapering down towards the bottom. In the centre of this space they were still more astonished to discover what had been an entire hive of bees, bees' wax, and a number of large cells in each of which the honey, in a solid state, something similar to the kernel of a nut, is still entire. On the discovery being made, Mr. Harvey paid attention to cut the log carefully around, and to preserve every portion of the wood which contained the hive, and it is now exceedingly interesting to trace the winding path of the bees, all along the edge of the tree as long as its growth would permit, until at last they were fairly enclosed by the growth, and their industry put an end of for ever. Very little seems to be known of the age of mahogany, but we should suppose that the tree in question may be about 300 years old. Of the value of the wood we know rather more. Messrs. Broadwood, the pianoforte makers, not long ago, having given £3000 for three logs, the produce of a single tree! —[Glasgow Constitution.]

Extensive Conflagration.—A letter from Pesth, in Hungary, on the 7th ultimo, says:

'We have just learnt that a dreadful conflagration has desolated the town of Stuhlweissenburg, about thirty five miles from this city. The fire began on the 7th, and was still burning yesterday when the despatch was sent off, four hundred, or according to other statements, six or eight hundred houses, were already reduced to ashes.'

CANADA.—Matters look rather squally in Canada. The Montreal Courier says, 'Ministers have been defeated in the legislative Council by a majority of five on the question of the seat of government. The consequence is, that the Speaker, the Hon. Mr. Jameson, has resigned. The chair, we are informed, has been offered to Mr. Draper; but that gentleman refuses to accept it. This question of the seat of government seems likely to turn out a very apple of discord.'

NAUVOO LYCEUM.

At a meeting of the young gentlemen of the city of Nauvoo, convened at the office of C. L. Higbee, Esq., on the evening of the 23d inst., to take into consideration the expediency of forming a Lyceum for the purpose of improving in debate, &c.; on motion, Gustavus Hills was called to the chair, and J. Hatch, Jr. appointed Secretary.

The object of the meeting was then pertinently explained by C. L. Higbee, Esq.; after which, the following resolutions were adopted:

1. Resolved, That this meeting be formed into a society to be known by the name and style of the Nauvoo Lyceum.

2. Resolved, That a committee of three be appointed to draft a Constitution and By-laws for the government of said society; whereupon the Chair appointed Messrs. J. Hatch, Jr., F. M. Higbee and L. O. Littlefield, to fill said committee.

3. Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be forwarded to the editor of the Neighbor, for publication in his valuable paper.

On motion, The meeting adjourned to meet again on Tuesday evening, December 5th, at 8 o'clock P. M.; when the question 'Ought Capital Punishment to be abolished,' will be debated.

SUMMER'S GONE.

BY MRS. NORTON.
Hark! through the dim woods dying,
With a moan,
Faintly the winds are sighing—
Summer's gone!
There when my bruised heart feeleth,
And the pale moon her face revealeth,
Darkly my footsteps steal th
To weep alone;
Hour after hour I wander—
By men unseen—
And sadly my young thoughts ponder
On what has been,
Summer's gone!

There in our own green bowers,
Long ago,
Our path through the tangled flowers
Treading slow;
On hand in hand entwining—
Off side by side reclining—
We've watched in its crimson shining,
The sunset glow,
Dimly the sun now burneth
For me alone—
Spring after spring yet turneth,
Thou art alone;
Summer's gone!

Still on my warm cheek playeth
The restless breeze;
Still in its freshness strayeth
Between the trees;
Still the blue streamlet gusheth—
Still the proud river rusheth—
The heart's disease;
But who shall bring our meeting,
Back again?
What shall recall thy greeting—
Loved in vain!
Summer's gone!

NOVEMBER.

BY MRS. CATHERINE ALLEN.
The Autumn skies are blue above,
The Autumn hills are brown,
On every thing a frosty gleam,
There shines a golden gleam,
And flashing through the valley's haze
The sunlit waters go,
And in the wood the wind is heard,
Like plaintive song of woe.

The ocean shores are bare and bleak,
White shroud is in the sky,
Thro' ivy's twilight overhead
The rustling wind duffeth,
From cut the chestnut woods you hear
The hyacinth's laugh and call:
And sunbeams play in purple round
The hazy water-fall.

The flowers have vanished from the wood
And lily the tinging of a flame—
We think of them as schoolmates dead
Whom we knew in dreams—
The dry stalks crackle as we walk—
Keen, fitful gusts are heard—
Out with what melancholy strange
The thoughtful heart is stirred!

From the New York Tribune.
ST. PETER'S CHURCH, AT ROME.
DURING HOLY WEEK.

There were too impressive things amid these pompous ceremonies. One was the chanting of the Miserere in the Sistine Chapel. Thirteen candles in the form of a triangle, are lighted up when the chanting of the lamentations commences. One after another is extinguished as it proceeds, until the last one at the top of the triangle, which represents the Saviour, is put out. The others, representing the prophets and good men that preceded our Saviour, one by one go out in the night of the grave, and the lamentation grows wider and deeper. But as the Prophet of the Prophets, the Light, the Hope of the World, disappeared, the lament suddenly ceased. Not a sound was heard amid the deepening gloom. The catastrophe was too awful and the shock too great to admit of speech. He who had been pouring his sorrowful notes over the departure of the good and the great seemed dumb at this last, this greatest woe. Stunned and stupefied, he could only contemplate the mighty disaster. I never felt a heavier pressure on my heart than at this time. The chapel was packed in every inch of it—even out of the doors, far back into the open hall, and yet not a sound was heard. I could hear the breathing of the mighty multitude, and amid it the frequent half-drawn sigh. Like the chanter, each man seemed to say—"Christ is gone! We are all orphans—! all orphans!" The silence at length became too painful. I thought I should shriek out in agony when suddenly a low wail so desolate and yet so sweet, so despairing and yet so tender, like the last strain of a broken heart, slowly stole out from the distant enclosure and swelled over the throng, that the tears rushed unbidden to my eyes and I could have wept like a child in sympathy. It then died away, as if the grief were too great for the strain. Fainter and fainter, like the tone of a lute, it sunk away, as if its last strain was over, when suddenly there burst through the arches a cry so piercing and shrill that it seemed not the voice of a song, but the language of a wounded and dying heart, in its last agonizing throes. The multitude awoke to it like the forest to the blast. Again it ceased, and the broken sob of exhausted grief alone was heard. In a moment the whole choir joined their lament and seemed to weep with the weeper. After a few notes, they paused again and that sweet, melancholy voice mourned alone, its tones still in my ear. I wanted to see the singer. It seemed as if such sound could come from nothing but a broken heart. Oh, how unlike the joyful, the triumphant anthem that swept through that same chapel on the morning that symbolized his Resurrection!

The other imposing ceremony was the benediction pronounced over the people. Probably not far from 50,000 persons were assembled in front of St. Peter's on the Easter Sunday. The military were drawn up in the form of a square in front while the immense multitude stood around them and on the steps of the Church. As I stood on the top of the colonnade and looked down on this sea of heads upturned to the balcony where the Pope stood with outstretched hands and beheld the glittering ranks of soldiers on their knees beneath the blue sky, I thought I never beheld a more imposing spectacle. In a moment it was over—the ranks arose like one man—the drums beat their reveille—the cannon from the summit of Adrian's tomb thundered over their joy—horses galloped over the square—ranks wheeled into order and the sea of men slowly rolled away from St. Peter's. Holy week closes with the grand illumination of St. Peter's and the Girolanda or fire-works on the castle of St. Angelo. It is impossible to describe the illumination. There are two—the first commencing at 8 and continuing till 9 o'clock, is called the silver one. It is caused by 4400 lanterns hung outside of the Church from the top of the dome to the base of the building, and so arranged as to reveal its entire architecture. Every column, cornice, frieze and window—all the details of the building and the entire structure are revealed in a soft, clear light, producing an effect indescribably pleasing yet utterly bewildering. It seemed in alabaster building lit from within. The long lines of light made by the columns with the shadows between; the beautiful cornice glittering over the darkness under it; the magnificent semicircular colonnades all inherent with light, and the immense dome rising like a mountain of silver in the deep darkness around, so completely defused the senses that one could think of nothing but a fairy fabric suddenly lunged and lighted by mid-heavens. This effect, however, is given only when one stands at a distance, as he always should. When the great bell strikes 9, 1475 lamps are suddenly lighted by the side of the lanterns and old St. Peter's blazes like a mountain of torches over the city.

THE WONDERS OF ANCIENT EGYPT.

That eminent German hierologist, Dr. Lepsius, at this time employed in Egypt by the Government of Prussia, and who dates his letter at Gizeh, at the foot of the pyramid of Cheops, says:

We arrived here on the 8th of November, and here we passed the first day of the new year. But who can foretell the extent of the rich harvest we may reap on this earliest scene of the history of mankind! It is incredible how little this spot has been explored, though more visited than any other part of Egypt.

The best maps of this site hitherto produced, represent two tombs besides the pyramids, having particular inscriptions and figures. Now we have drawn a minute topographical plan of the whole monumental plain, and on the plan there are marked, independently of the pyramids, forty five tombs, whose occupants I have ascertained by the inscriptions. There are also other eighty two tombs, which on account of their inscriptions or other peculiarities, demand particular attention. With the exception of about twelve, which belong to a later period, all these tombs were erected contemporaneously with or soon after the building of the great pyramid, and consequently their dates throw an invaluable light on the study of human civilization in the most remote period of antiquity.

The sculptures in relief are surprisingly numerous, and represent whole figures, some the size of life, and others of various dimensions. The paintings are on back grounds of the finest chalk. They are numerous and beautiful beyond conception—as fresh and perfect as if finished yesterday. The pictures and sculptures on the walls of the tombs represent for the most part scenes in the lives of the deceased persons, whose wealth in cattle, fish, boats, servants, &c., is occasionally displayed before the eyes of the spectator. All this gives an insight into the details of private life among the ancient Egyptians.

By the help of these inscriptions, I think I could without difficulty make a Court Calendar of the reign of King Cheops. In some instances I have traced the graves of fathers, sons, grandsons, and even great-grandsons—all that now remains of the distinguished families which five thousand years ago formed the nobility of the land.

I now employ daily fifty or sixty men in digging and other kinds of labor, and a large excavation has been made in front of the great Sphinx.

From this account of the actual state of Egyptian researches, we perceive there is ample opportunity for more extensive discoveries than have yet been made; and the extraordinary character of those already before the public, cannot fail to stimulate and encourage us in our researches. A writer, whom I have before cited, has condensed from Kossellini and other hierologists, the following remarks: "Philologists, astronomers, chemists, painters, architects, physicians, must return to Egypt to learn the origin of language and writing—of the calendar and solar motion—of the art of cutting granite with a copper chisel, and of giving elasticity to a copper sword—of making glass with the variegated hues of the rainbow—of moving single blocks of polished syenite, nine hundred tons in weight, to any distance by land and water; of building arches, round and pointed, with masonry of precision, unsurpassed at the present day, and antecedent by two thousand years, to the Cloaca Maxima of Rome; of sculpturing a Doric column a thousand years before the Dorians are known in history; of fresco painting in imperishable colors; and of practical knowledge in anatomy."

Every craftsman can behold, in Egyptian monuments, the progress of his art four thousand years ago; and whether it be a wheelright building a chariot; a shoemaker drawing his twine; a leather cutter using the self same knife of old as is considered the best form now; a weaver throwing the same hand shuttle; a white smith using that identical form of blow pipe but lately recognized to be the most efficient; the seal engraver cutting, in hieroglyphics, such names as Shofar, above four thousand three hundred years ago; or even the poulterer, removing the pip from geese; all these and many more evidences of Egyptian priority now require but a glance at the plates of Rosellini!

To this catalogue of Egyptian arts, a long addition might be made of monuments descriptive of the goldsmith's and jeweller's work; instrumental music, singing, dancing and gymnastic exercises, including children's games, like some of the present day; the tasteful furniture of their houses; ship building; drawings in natural history, so true to the life that the French naturalists, by means of them instantly recognized the several species of Egyptian birds designated by them; and of numberless other branches of art, which time will not permit us to particularize.

Can we wonder then, at the high eulogium which I have before cited from the scriptures, on the great leader of the Israelites, that he was learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians; or at the still higher which is said to have excelled 'all the wisdom of Egypt?' Can we any longer feel surprised at the enthusiasm of Champollion, when, on landing for the first time in Egypt, he knelt to the ground and kissed the soil? In his own glowing language, after traversing that country of wonders, and arriving at the monument of Karnak, he says:

"All that I had seen appeared miserable in comparison with the gigantic conceptions by which I was surrounded at Karnak. I shall take care not to describe anything; for either my description would not express the thousandth part of what ought to be said, or if I drew but a faint sketch of it, I should be set down as an enthusiast, or perhaps for a madman."

LETTER FROM REV. DURBIN.
SUMMIT or MOUNT SINA,
February 5, 1843.

My Dear Bishop Waugh:—How shall I put on paper what I feel this moment, as I set apart from my companions on the very summit of Mount Sina, with the expanded plains before me in which Israel encamped at the giving of the law! It is impossible to doubt; I feel the truth, and by faith I see the lightnings, hear the thunders, and feel this vast world of dark, dreary desolation within which Horeb is included as a sanctuary, quake under the tread of the Almighty.

If I had been an infidel, and had come hither as I have, from Cairo, (near the ancient Memphis) by the Wady el Teb, or 'Valley of the Wanderers,' which connects with the Red Sea, about fifteen miles south of Suez, through Wady Tamarik, by one of the most fearful and peculiar mountain-passes to be found on earth; and had I there seen the physical truth of the scriptures, where the people were 'entangled in the land,' and the wilderness of the Red Sea 'had shut them in,' the only place between the Nile and the sea of which the scripture history can be affirmed; then if I stood on the opposite shore, and looked down upon the waters in which Pharaoh's host had 'sunk as lead,' and there read the triumphal song of Moses, (Exodus, chap. xv.) I should have felt that no where else, nor under any other circumstances, could that incomparable composition have been produced then, if I had followed them 'three days in the wilderness of Shur,' to the present bitter fountain of Hamarrah, (the scripture Marah), and the next day to the Wady Carundel and Umoth, where yet are water and many trees amidst the surrounding desolation. I should have said, here is 'Elm,' with its ivy-like wells of water, and three score and ten palm trees, (Exod. ch. xv.) and from these following their track through Wady Feiran, I had suddenly issued through the Pass Nakh Hawy out into the Plain of Rehah, which now lies before me at the base of the perpendicular walls of the Red Sea, rising like a terrible battlement twelve or fifteen hundred feet high, with the valley of Wady Sheik to the right, and the wide mouth of Wady Leja to the left, all in full view of the gloomy, sterile, desolate, thunder-splintered pinnacles, where I now sit; I would have bowed to the holy history of Moses, simply upon the grounds of its geographical accuracy, which no writer, ancient or modern, has equalled, though he wrote three thousand five hundred years ago, and in the midst of an encampment of two million of people, who depended upon him for guidance and salvation. Yet this accuracy is not the result of revision through successive ages, for no Jew has ever made a pilgrimage to Horeb, (which is itself a miracle,) except the prophet Elijah who fled from Jezabel, and whose pretended resting place in a rock was shown to us the other day.

But the shades of evening are drawing on and the dark shadows of the lofty mountains are already projected far into the shady plain. O! if you glorious sun, fast descending westward behind the distant gloomy mountains, and just now with his orient beams tinting the dawn in your heavens; under which dwell all that I hold most dear on earth; if this dim beams which now fall almost level on me, could but convey to you what I feel this moment, it would be an epistle in deed. But I must hasten down from the mount of God, and rest me in the monastery; built as tradition says, where Moses beheld the burning bush. There, I hope to finish this letter, and say how I have spent the day of the Lord in his holy mountain in a cleft of which I was so fortunate as to find a young, vigorous shrub, planted by the hand of the Almighty in his own holy hill, which I have cut, and purpose if God spare us to meet again, and spend an hour of leisure together, to present to you, and to explain at length why I have adopted the new route (the southern) for Israel from the Red Sea, a route over which no one, I believe has passed heretofore, who has written expressly on the subject, but which has often been suggested by eminent travellers, who have felt pressed with the difficulties of the northern route by Suez, among whom are Beckhardt and Laborde.

SEE HERE!
CHEAP BOOT AND SHOE MANUFACTORY!!

The subscriber would respectfully inform the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity that he intends to manufacture Boots and Shoes much cheaper than has been done heretofore in this city. He would also inform the farmers that he will take hides and produce in part pay.

He returns his thanks to the public generally for the liberal patronage heretofore extended, and hopes, in consequence of his reduced prices to merit a still greater share of the patronage of those who wish to encourage home manufacture, and labour rather than compel many of their mechanics to leave the city and their families and seek employment elsewhere in consequence of the Eastern work brought here by our merchants who only object and aim seems to be to enrich themselves regardless of the sufferings of their own citizens, instead of bringing leather and having it manufactured at home.

His work will be made out of the best materials and workmanship not excelled by any in the city, at the following prices:

Men's Work.
Fine Boots, from $5 to 5.50
Kip do 4.00
Coarse do 3.00
Mock do from 2.25 to 2.50

I wish I could sit here in this deep solitude for an hour longer; but my companions and one guide are gone, and the other, a young active Arab, is crouched at my feet in astonishment at my writing and apparent earnestness; and seems to say as he casts a glance at the setting sun, 'the way is long and dangerous.' So I must say, Fare thee well, Sinai! I have stood upon the Alps, in the middle of July, and looked around upon the snowy empire—I have stood upon the Apennines, and looked upon the plains of beautiful eventful Italy—I have stood upon the Albanian mount and beheld the scene of the Eneid from the Circean promontory, over the Campagna, to the eternal city and the mountains of Trivoli—I have sat down upon the pyramids of Egypt, and cast my eyes over the sacred city of Heliopolis, and the land of Goshen, the fields of Jewish bondage, and the ancient Memphis, where Moses and Aaron, on the part of God and his people, contended with Pharaoh and his servants, the death of whose first born of man and beast in one night filled the land with wailing; but I have never set my feet on any spot from whence was visible so much stern, gloomy grandeur, heightened by the silence and solitude that reign around; and infinitely more heightened by the awful and sacred associations of the first great revelation in form from God to man. I feel oppressed with the spirit that breathes around me, and seems to inhabit this holy place. I shall never set down upon the summit of Sinai again, and look upon the silent and empty plains at its feet; but I shall go down a better man, and aim so to live as to escape the terrible thunders at the last day which once reverberated through these mountains, but have long since given way to the gospel of peace. I can scarcely tear myself away from this hallowed summit, and I wish I too could linger here forty days, in converse with the Lord.

IRON AND STEEL.
THE subscriber has on hand a large assortment of Iron, Steel, Ropes and Nails of various descriptions. Also a large assortment of Hollowware, consisting of Oats, Kettles, Pans, Ovens &c. &c. all of which articles he is prepared to sell low for cash; wholesale and retail.

He also has on hand a constant supply of edge tools of various descriptions, which he makes at his manufactory, and which he is prepared to furnish to order at his store, near the corner of Partridge and Knight St.

Agricultural.

Effects of soap-suds on Cabbage.—I believe it will be a thankless piece of service for one gardener to teach another how to grow cabbage and cauliflowers, yet these crops of vegetables have failed this season in various parts of the country. The following notice may perhaps be of use to our cottage readers:

Wherever soap-suds have been used plentifully, cabbage and cauliflowers have grown luxuriantly. I have made several inquiries of others who have used them, and in no one instance have I heard of a failure where soap-suds have been applied. I intend to try them over brocoli, to see if they will prevent them from clubbing. Others may do so likewise, and make known the results. Whether the alkali in the water has prevented the enemy from destroying the roots, or given the roots more vigor to resist the attack, I do not know; but one thing is certain—where such matter has been applied, it has produced the most beneficial results. I think cottagers may take a lesson from this, and save that which would nourish their languishing crop, for it is a pity to see a pool of filthy water polluting the neighborhood with its stench, while, within a few yards of it, the vegetables of a garden are dying of starvation.—[Gardener's Chronicle.]

Gapes in Chickens.—The following is an extract of a letter received from a friend in Carolina:

In writing to you, it will probably not be amiss to communicate a fact which will be of some interest to the lovers of fried chickens. Some of my neighbors have entirely prevented, and others have speedily cured that destructive malady, the gapes in their chickens, by mixing a small quantity of turpentine in their food. From five to ten drops added to a pint of meal to be made into dough, are the proportions used. I have no doubt of the universal and certain success of the remedy, relying, as I do, upon the character of those who have communicated it to me.

Yours truly,
BENJ. ANDERSON.

Substitute for Cream.—Beat up the yolk of a fresh egg in a basin, and then add boiling tea or water over it gradually to prevent it curdling. In flavor and richness this preparation resembles cream.

Preserving Eggs.—There is a patent in England for preserving eggs; the composition used is as follows, and by adopting the method it is said eggs have been kept two years:

One barrel of quick lime, thirty two ounces of salt, eight ounces of cream of tartar. Mix the whole together, with as much water as will reduce the composition to such a consistency that an egg, when put into it, will swim.

THE RIGHT OF SEARCH.

This question which caused us to war with that grasping tyrant among monarchs; the English sovereign; and upon which we came off conquerors, has again been brought up under the silver veil of philanthropy and religion by the same arbitrary power whose fleets and armies have robbed, or attempted to rob almost every kingdom, nation, tribe and people under Heaven.

Mahomet, when he would become the conqueror of a world, went forth in the name of God, and deluded the millions of the east with a picture of the believer's heaven, where sensuality held high court—on thrones of pearl, amid towers of jessamine, and where the crown of love outshone the crown of truth, and yet Mahomet believed not his own creed, and made day by day a new chapter of the Koran, to sanctify his successive crimes.

The English Government would conquer the world, and they would do it, too, in the name of humanity, civilization, and religion. Mahomet had some justification in his ignorance of the true God, and of the meek and lowly Messiah; but, as for England, in the nineteenth century, with the blushes of the millennial morning, kissing the peaks of her hills, there is no apology that can be offered which will stand the test of reason.

Ambition urges the British lion forward, and the want of blood and plunder sanctifies his brutal deeds.

Napoleon was conquered because he interfered with the trade of Great Britain and caused her commerce to decline from Riga, to the Cape of Good Hope, from the pillars of Hercules to the Euxine.

Knowing the grasping power of the mistress of the seas, and knowing also the clock which she wears to conceal her assassin dagger, it is not strange that the American people should require argument upon argument to prove that the right of search, as claimed by England, is nothing more than a demand upon the world to bow to her meteor flag, and acknowledge her Empress of the ocean wave.

Lord Aberdeen holds that the right of search is a little thing which all should acknowledge and perpetrate. That England will submit to it as well as the rest, and that humanity pleads its virtue in tones of angelic love. We point the noble Lord to the fable of Aescop, which illustrates this pretended equality among the marine of nations.

The lion and the other animals once met together, probably in holy alliance, to partake of a feast; but when the eating commenced, there was but one plate well filled at the table, and that plate contained the lion's share.

Who, that has witnessed the insolence of British naval officers, when boarding American merchantmen abroad, where the stars and stripes are seldom seen floating from the ensign belliards of an Amercan man-of-war, can think of the acknowledgment of such a right without a shudder, or of the folly of the American that advocates it without a curse.

We have seen the insolence of the agents of this kingly power; this royal apostle of religion and humanity; whose right hand holds the new testament, and whose left clasps the bloody code of Draco. We have heard the islanders of the Archipelago groan when Saint George's cross floated in the offing, and the Admiral's signal cannon called the British Consul alongside.

Who that has read of the settlement of British India, where religion sowed her pearls upon a field of blood, can think of British humanity with composure.

How sad the moral which is conveyed by the fact, that although France is battling the Moors upon the hills of Algiers, and England is carrying desolation along the shores of the Yellow Sea, and amid the Ghauts of Afghanistan; the journals of London and Paris pronounce that their respective countries are at peace with the world. No hand then, whose people refuse to wear tights and round hats, and eat flesh with a spoon, is considered to be in the world by France and England. The laws of nations therefore are dead letters, from the Black Sea round to the Cordilleras. The inhabitants of the land of Shem; those good old children of the remnant who left the ark upon the Himmaleh's icy peak, when the flood went down with a lull, and the sun came up from a cloud of mist; are to be cut and carved, robbed and scourged at pleasure, by the very religious, humane and tender conscientious power of England. We have been long surprised at the Honorable John Quincy Adams' efforts to sustain the English Government in its attack upon the sons of Confucius and the Mexican Government in its war with Texas. We think however, we have found the secret spring that moved him to such a course. He has determined to join that church which, in earlier days gave the lands of the earth to the christian conquerors, and granted forgiveness to the children of blood.

Mr. Adams, like all other converts who turn at the eleventh hour, has been convinced, not by the power of the heart, but by the power of the head; and he feels bound not only to live up to the present creed, which no man, as it is exemplified in this country, can find fault with, but to go far beyond the Abbot of Unreason or the Monk of La Trappe. He would hold an argument with Saint Peter himself, and endeavor to prove that the keys which the janus of Heaven has, would be safer in his philanthropic hands. Like the Passyites of Oxford and Cambridge, he has gone back to first principles; but instead of taking the old cat—the truth—by the tail, he has grasped a handful of bleary-eyed kittens, who were sired by leopards and whelped by she wolves.

It is easy then, to conceive why the Massachusetts puritan, whose ancestors brought Charles the First to the scaffold for his religion, should now join in the jesuitical cry of Conquer China, and make way for the truth of God.

England is fast returning to the oldest religion, bearing the impress of Divinity, and like all backsliders, her children will have to do many things which savor of cruelty and iron-handed strength to convince the true believers that their repentance is real. But to such a course we enter our solemn protest. The day for spreading religion by the sword has passed. The scourge of God rests in the mountain's bosom. The conquerors of the east have gone out one by one like lamps in a city suddenly deserted, and with the single exception of the United States, there is no spot where liberty can exist with religion, and the purse and the sword remain in the same hand for ages without abuse or dread.

Let us then bid the tyrant power beware how she claims dominion over the infidel world, or searcheth in the name of a mock philanthropy the ships of our republic, who like the camels of Ishmael, claim the right to navigate unquestioned the pathless desert of the deep, and who alone can carry liberal principles to a distant and benighted world.

Some impudent fellow—we don't know who—thus discourses about the girls:

The Girls.—They think of Hymen, and they can't help sighing. When their Lover forsakes them, they can't help crying. They sit at the window, and can't help spying. To get each a beau, they can't help trying. At the mirror they can't help twisting and turning and lacing and tying. They screw up their corsets, bring on the consumption, and can't help dying.

SHERMAN'S

MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

CAMPOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER. This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents), brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

This gentleman has already made some remarkable discoveries in and about the Pyramids; but the most important is that of the celebrated Labyrinth, a short account of which we extract from his late letters published in London, dated Pyramid of Moeris, June 20.

"We have now been settled for some weeks at the ruins of the Labyrinth of Moeris, and I hasten to give you the first information as the definite discovery of the site of the true Labyrinth and Pyramid. We were astonished that earlier travellers had scarcely mentioned these remains, when we saw ruins of hundreds of still well defined chambers lying before us. The main result of our investigation is, however, the finding, on many of the pillars and architraves of the hall, the name of the true Moeris, who built the labyrinth for his palace, and the pyramid for his tomb. This pyramid is the latest of all the pyramids of the Pharaohs. King Moeris reigned from 2194 to 2151, B. C. (or 4037 years ago) and was the last king of the old kingdom of Egypt before its conquest by the Hyksos. Both the labyrinth and the lake prove his power, his love of magnificence, and his interest in the welfare of his people. At the end of the vast plain lies the pyramid in which Moeris was buried, with the ruins of the village, precisely as described by Strabo. Near this were many hillocks beneath which we found several hundred chambers, some of them with roofs, corridors, and columns. The rooms are so irregular and of such various sizes, that no one could have found their way, without a guide, through this mass of buildings. Herodotus describes 3000 apartments above and below the ground, an account which the remains lead me to believe not exaggerated.

The forms of the most important part of the palace are described by Herodotus as consisting of twelve halls, that is, of twelve open courts surrounded by covered colonnades. This palace was surrounded by labyrinthine buildings on three sides, and intersected by a water course. Here our establishments occupy the ruins of the pyramid, and recall the old village of Strabo which lay on the same level with the pyramid. Around us are scattered huge blocks of granite, the remains of old pillars and architraves of the courts, which are of interest, as offering in several cases, the names of the builder, Moeris, and his sister who succeeded him. I am employing one hundred workmen in digging into the chambers, and lately in searching for the entrance into the pyramid.

Dr. Lepsius has also discovered the remains of many pyramids, and a large number of tombs, which recent travellers had overlooked. Being one of the best hierologists living, he has been enabled readily to decipher the numerous inscriptions with which the monuments of Egypt are covered, and to identify the sovereigns and distinguished personages by whom these tombs were built and occupied. In fact, so precise was this ancient people in the erection and decoration of their tombs, with paintings and inscriptions that the doctor states that he could give a complete history of their country.

While on the subject of Egypt, we cannot refrain from speaking of the highly interesting and instructive lectures on Egyptian archaeology and ethnology, delivered during last winter in this city by George R. Gliddon, Esq. As the materials from which Mr. Gliddon derives his information, (in addition to a long residence in Egypt) are not accessible in this country, owing to their great cost, his lectures embody an immense deal of information entirely new to us. It is to be hoped that he may be induced to repeat them the coming winter.

Besides this Egyptian expedition, which is enough to immortalize the name of its royal patron, the king of Prussia has, at his own expense, sent another expedition under the direction of Prof. Rich, the Asiatic traveller, and Dr. Rose, with instructions to commence their researches at Trebizond, to trace to their sources in the highlands of Erzerum, the western Euphrates, the Araxes, and the Tschoruk. From thence they are to proceed to the second highlands of Armenia, and so on to the ruins of Ani. They are then to visit and examine the range of mountains which connects the ranges of the Caucasus and the Armenian Taurus. Next to proceed to the Tartarian Circassians and the sources of the Kuban; and afterwards examine the numerous monuments in the valley of the Karaschai. In addition to this, the same enlightened sovereign has appointed a scientific commission, far more extensive than either of those before mentioned. It is composed of thirty-two members, having at its head the distinguished phlogist Bopp. (Who, however, on account of his great age, does not accompany the commission.) This expedition is to visit the East Indies and make a scientific and artistic exploration of those islands and countries. It is expected to be absent three years.

The French minister of war has appointed a commission from among the members of the institute to select and arrange the documents and reports of the scientific commission to Algeria, with a view to their immediate publication, as a sequel to the great national works on Egypt and the Morea. He has also issued a decree for the removal of the triumphal arch of Djimlak, said to be the most perfect of the Roman monuments discovered in Africa, for re-erection in some conspicuous part of Paris.

Recent events which have occurred at the east have made the Celestial Empire an object of more interest than that of any other country with which we have intercourse. A new era is about to begin in the commercial intercourse with China, the barriers which for ages have shut out all foreigners from that country, are about to be removed; and when a treaty shall have been formed with that power, by which we can gain access to the treasures that lie within her boundaries, a vast and untried field will be presented to us. Her language and literature must be cultivated, and the time is not far distant when they must be taught in our seminaries of learning; for without a knowledge of them we can never become acquainted with her people or her institutions.

An important undertaking has already been commenced, which, if continued and completed, will furnish us with much valuable information relative to this people. This work is no less than an Encyclopedia of the Chinese language, but so extensive will it be, that it may with propriety be called an Encyclopedia of the Empire.

The peculiarities of the Chinese language are such, that a complete dictionary of it, unlike the dictionaries of European languages, which are confined to words and their definitions, is a history and description of every object that exists within the empire. Their language, it is known, is not phonetic but every word, and every object is represented by a different character; which character once formed, never become changed. This is the reason why philologists suppose that the written and spoken language of the Chinese are different; an assertion which, to a certain extent, is correct. But this difference is no greater than our colloquial language, and that of our poets.

The origin of the Chinese Encyclopedia alluded to may be found in the preface to the work. K'ang-hi, the greatest emperor, and most learned man that China ever knew, finding that there existed no work embracing all the riches of the language, conceived the design of erecting, in the midst of the vast field of Chinese philology, a literary monument that should render his reign famous to all succeeding ages. With this view, he assembled in his palace the most distinguished literati of the empire, and laying before them all the ancient and modern works that could be got, he commanded them to collect all the words, allusions, forms, and figures of speech, of which examples could be found in the Chinese language; to devote a distinct paragraph to each, and to illustrate each word with quotations from original works. Seventy-six distinguished men were in consequence assembled at Pekin who labored with assiduity, kept up a correspondence with others in different parts of the empire, and at the end of eight years completed the work in 133 thick volumes, which was printed at the public expense. This was as late as the year 1711. The preface of the work was written by the Emperor himself. The Chinese types for this book are to be cast in Canton. The translation will comprise 20 volumes of 600 pages each.

The importance of this publication must be obvious to every one; for at present, all the knowledge we have of China, exists in the works of the Jesuit Missionaries, most of which were written more than a century ago. We continually hear of the knowledge of certain arts in the empire which we suppose were only known to moderns; and we believe, that with the exception of the steam engine, every modern invention has been found to be known to the Chinese.

Within a year past, much has been said of a great invention in England, in the construction of houses with iron plates riveted together. By the last arrival from China, we have accounts from Mr. Gutzlaff, who says he has found some pagodas of great antiquity in that country, made of iron plates, bolted together, covered with paintings and elaborate carvings.

In Persia much valuable ethnographic information has recently been brought to light by the architects and artists attached to the French embassy in that country. Their operations were made by order of the minister of foreign affairs, and the results of their investigations will be published by the French government. They embrace researches among the ruins of Nineveh, Babylon, Tebatana, Sappor, Persepolis, Ctesiphon, Seleucia, &c. This work will be the most extensive ever published on that interesting region. It will require 10 years to complete the publication of the work.

We look with much eagerness for the results of the recent investigations and discoveries among these venerable monuments, for no portion of the ancient world is more interesting to us than this. A large portion of the Bible History is connected with the ancient kingdoms of Assyria and Babylon; but the literal fulfillment of prophecy of the total annihilation of Babylon is so completely obliterated and blotted out all that remains of her grandeur, that nothing remains but a few immense heaps—ruined masses, surrounded by impassable swamps and morasses, and inhabited by wild beasts, that man has not dared to venture among. The bricks of Babylon, and other places, are covered with the coniform or arrow-headed character. These, by the aid of Grotendorf and Lassen, can now be read. This species of writing is composed of letters, and not of syllabic signs; is written horizontally, and is read from left to right.

The Persepolitan inscriptions as far as known, have reference to Darius Hystaspes, and Xerxes. There appears to be two or three different languages of these arrow-headed characters; those of Persepolis are best understood, and are deciphered through the Zend, or old Persian language. With no branch of philology are English readers less acquainted than with this, for the exception of a short treatise by Grotendorf, appended to Heeren's Researches, we have nothing on the subject in the English language.

During the present year some interesting discoveries have been made on the site of ancient Nineveh by Mr. Botta, who has communicated an account of them to the Journal Asiatique of Paris. Nothing marks the site of this once great city but some immense heaps of earth, but history and tradition unite in determining its place. The person alluded to has caused excavations to be made in a great tumulus or heap of rubbish, when he discovered regular walls. A farther examination led him to chambers and corridors, the walls of which contained carvings of men and animals, chariots with warriors, and some curious pieces of sculpture. Mr. Botta is continuing his excavations, which he thinks are the first that have brought to light monuments of the times when ancient Nineveh was still in her glory.

In Afghanistan and Central Asia, the labors of the English in their inquiries into the history, literature, and languages of the people who have successively occupied those countries have met with signal success. The East India Company has lately published a work by Prof. Wilson, on the coins and antiquities of Afghanistan, from materials collected by Mr. Masson, who has spent many years in that country, exploring its ruins and opening its treasures. The result of these investigations is important, and throws much light on the history of the ancient Bactrian kingdom. From the fact that the Greek language was used on their coins, and the Hellenic symbols preserved in their mythology, it is evident that this language was used at their court, if not more extensively disseminated. Another fact deduced from the symbols and inscriptions on their coins, is, that a race of kings, descended from the Greeks, once reigned there, who employed the Greek language and legends. It is probable, too, that the Greek language and literature were cultivated there until the invasion of the barbarians who poured down their hordes over Persia, Media, and Asia Minor, and cut off all communication between Europe and Central Asia. This irruption completely obliterated the civilization which had been infused by the Greeks, and, to a great extent, supplanted the worship of Brahma and Buddha for that of Mahomet.

TEXAS, MEXICO, AND GREAT BRITAIN.

A correspondent of the New Orleans Tropic, writing from Galveston under date of October 13th, gives the following report of a coup d'etat said to be in contemplation between President Houston and the British authorities. The Tropic says that the information of the writer is derived from the very highest and most undoubted sources.

General Murphy, United States Charge to Texas, has left the seat of Government, (Washington,) and is now in this city. Strange rumors are afloat about the cause of his removal from thence, and other matters in connexion therewith. Mr. Abell, bearer of dispatches of the United States Government, who was wrecked on the Sarah Barnes, will, I hope, be more fortunate on the schooner Galveston which conveys this letter, and reach his Government in safety. On his arrival at Washington there will be some strange developments made public, which are topics of daily conversation in Texas. Although you will discover nothing but dark hints from the press, I will draw aside the veil, Messrs. Editors, for your especial benefit, as I remember to have seen in your paper frequent predictions of the very treason which I have now the mortification to announce. It is this: That General Murphy suspected some secret machinations between the British and Texian Government, highly detrimental to the United States interests, and forthwith set about discovering the nature of the mystery. This he was enabled to do during President Houston's absence at the Indian treaty ground; he being furnished with authenticated and undoubted copies of the entire treasonable correspondence held by the President with the Representatives of the British and Mexican Governments, binding himself to send commissions to the Mexican Government to recognize the nominal sovereignty of Mexico, provided that Government will thereupon make a session of Texas to Great Britain for a consideration. Texas will then be a British Province, by session from Mexico and consent of the Executive of the Republic! The confirmation of the senate and sanction of the people can be relied on, it is supposed, after sustaining the ordeal which the President has led them through. Once a Province of Great Britain, the immediate abolition of slavery follows, as a matter of course; but a consideration is secured for the slave holder.

On the other hand, letters from Vera Cruz say that the relations between Mexico and England are unfriendly; that the British Minister has broke off all communications with Santa Anna's Government, and informed his countrymen that none will be renewed until he can hear from England. A British fleet is looked for.

SUNDAY TRADING.

The Liverpool (England) Chronicle of a late date says that a diminutive and sickly looking boy of about twelve years old, who gave the name of Peter Priggins, was brought up before Mr. Rushton, charged by police man 42 with attempting to pick a gentleman's pocket at the post office. The police man stated that he observed several boys mingling amongst the crowd who were receiving their letters, and that he at last detected the prisoner inserting his hand into a gentleman's pocket. The boy however, finding himself observed, endeavored to escape, but was pursued and captured by witness. The worthy magistrate, after commenting in his usual impressive manner upon the heinousness of the offence, and more especially on the additional guilt incurred by its having been committed on the Lord's day, was about to pass sentence, when he was interrupted by a somewhat singular individual who stood up, and addressing himself to the bench, stated that the prisoner was 'the hope of his age, his twilight's lonely beam,' his eldest son. The following dialogue then took place:—

Father—'Your worship! objects to this prosecution.'

Mr. Rushton—'On what grounds do you object sir?'

Father—'Vy the taking of the boy was illegal.'

Mr. Rushton—'How do you make that out?'

Father—'Vy the police man was following his hordinary calling on the Lord's day, (here he referred to a newspaper which he held in his hand,) and if he hadnt no business to be following his hordinary calling, he hadnt no business to be taking the boy, and consequently the taking was illegal. Here's the fact, and he held forth the newspaper, and read the quotation from the act that no tradesman, artificer, workman, laborer, or other person whatsoever, shall or do exercise any worldly labor, business or work of their ordinary calling on the Lord's day, and then he continued; now every body knows that a peeler ain't a tradesman, or a laborer, or any thing so respectable, but it is clear that he is a 'other person whatsoever.' As to what is said about 'juden genus,' I don't know what that means, but a peeler can't be a juden genus, coz he is a peeler.'

Mr. Rushton said that the point was raised with considerable ability by the applicant, and he felt great difficulty in knowing how to deal with the case. He thought that if the police man was excluded from Lord Tender's man's meaning of 'juden genus,' the taking was illegal, and he felt disposed in this instance to give the boy the benefit of the doubt, and he would do so the more readily if the applicant would promise to look after the morals of his son for the future. He should like to know what was the applicant's occupation.

Applicant—Occupant! I belongs to the profession.'

Mr. Dawling observed to Mr. Rushton, that he was well known to the police as a notorious and successful burglar, but that he had hitherto escaped conviction.

Here the applicant looked Mr. Dawling steadily in the face, and then brought the end of his thumb in contact with the point of his nose. Mr. Rushton hoped that he would not make any disrespectful signals in that court. The applicant replied that 'didnt mean nothing, but he know'd the backs of parliament too well to get convicted.'

Mr. Rushton (to the boy)—'What are you brought up as a professional thief?'

Boy—'To be sure I am.'

Mr. Rushton—'Then I fine you 5s for carrying on your ordinary occupation on the Lord's day.'

Another Murder in Missouri.—Another case of murder occurred in Platte county, Mo. Two men named Asher and Hutton quarrelled, when Asher attacked the other with a large stick, (and he, to defend himself, (as he says) shot him through the body. They were both over 60 years of age.

Our Morals.—Jail to Let. Our county jail is, and for the last two months has been without a tenant, and will be rented on reasonable terms—apply to the Sheriff. There is a great dearth of rogues here, and our police officers are idle. Here in a young State in the west is an example for the very moral people of Pennsylvania, New York and New England, where murders, robberies and outrages are of daily occurrence.

The Results of an Execution.—A letter from Stockholm of the 3d ult. says:—

Yesterday the execution of a man named Breitfeldt took place for murder, robbery, and incendiarism. Two curious events marked this punishment. In Sweden the pain of death consists in decollation with an axe, and for this purpose the delinquent is placed on a block, before which a trench is dug, into which the head falls, and where the body of the culprit is afterwards thrown, and then covered over with earth. There exists among the common people a strange belief that the blood of a decapitated person taken internally is a sovereign cure for epilepsy, and the custom handed down from times immemorial is to permit the spectators to take the blood. As soon as Breitfeldt's head had fallen, an elderly peasant woman rushed forward with a morsel of bread in her hand, to soak it in the sanguinary stream spouting from the trunk, but just as she was stretching forth her hand one of her fits seized her, and she fell dead into the trench. The other incident which marked the day was caused by a quarrel which arose between a porter and a carpenter, the former at last gave the latter a blow in the face, on which the other, slipping behind, struck him a violent blow with an axe, and split his skull to the neck. The murderer was immediately arrested, and when interrogated before a magistrate, declared that the execution of the day had suggested to him the idea of using the axe. He was previously noted for his good conduct.

The Washington family.—O'Connell, in his Memoir of Ireland, gives the following incident. During the celebrated Massacres in Ireland just preceding the rise of Cromwell, in the year 1641, Lieut. Col. Gibson having given quarter to all those contained in the castle of Carrigmain, put them all to the sword, being about 350, most of them women and children; and Col. Washington, endeavoring to save a pretty child of seven years of age, carried him under his cloak; but the child, against his will, was killed in his arms, which was the principal motive for his quitting that service. Where was the name of Washington ever heard of that it was not connected with some generous action.

Sheriff Murdered in Missouri.—Mr. Samuel B. Wingo, Sheriff of Shannon county, Missouri, was cruelly murdered in open day, on the 31st of August, near the village of Harmony, by a person named Moyres, on whose property he was about to execute a levy. Moyres, the principal, and two others have been arrested.

A journeyman printer lately set out on foot for the interior of Ohio, a distance of five hundred miles, with an old brass rule and three dollars cash in his pocket. He soon found himself in Pennsylvania and being weary, called at the inn of a Dutchman, who he found quietly smoking his pipe, when the following dialogue ensued:—

'Vell, Nishter Valking Sillick, vot you want?'

'Refreshment and repose.'

'Supper and lodgings, I reckon.'

'Yes, sir, supper and lodgings.'

'Pe you a Yankee pedlar, mit chawelry in your pack to cheat to graft?'

'No sir; no Yankee pedlar.'

'A singling teacher too lazy to work?'

'No, sir.'

'A chentel shoemaker, vot stichys till Saturday night, and laysh thrunk in de porch hafter Sunday?'

'No, sir, I should have mended my boots before this. But I am not disposed longer to submit to this outlandish inquisition, can you give me supper and lodgings?'

'Torkerly. But what be you, a book achent, taking honest peoples money for larnin, vot only makes em lazy?'

'Try again, your worship.'

'A dentist, breaking to peoples chaws, at a tollar schmag, and running off mit old Shambock's daughter?'

'No, sir; no tooth puller.'

'A Kernojos, dan, feeling to young folks heads, like so many cabitch, and charging 25 cents for telling their fortunes, like a bland Yankou?'

'No; no phrenologist, neither, your Excellency.'

'Vell, den vat de tiffle are you! Choost tell, and you shall have some of the best assage for supper, and stchay all night free gratis, mitout charging you a cent mit a chill of whiskey to start on before preakfast?'

'Very well your honor. To terminate the colloquy without further circumlocution, I am an humble disciple of Faust—a professor of the art preservative of all arts—a typographer, at your service!'

'Votchee dat?'

'A printer, sir, a man that prints books and newspapers.'

'A man vot prints nooshpapers! O yawl yawl! By Chooshter—aye! aye! Datsch it: a man vot prints nooshpapers—yawl yawl!—Valk up, walk up, Nishter Brnter! Cheems take de chentleman's pack off, Chon, bring some juuks to the fire. A man vot prints nooshpapers. I wish I may be shot if I didn't tink you was a tailor.'

The late Conflagration at Hamburg.—The senate and people of Hamburg in grateful acknowledgement of her Majesty's bounty and the liberality of the English nation, have addressed a letter to the Queen in suitable terms, signed by the presiding burgomaster, and forwarded it to their resident here, (Mr. Colquhoun), which has been presented to her Majesty. The address is beautifully written on vellum, and illuminated with gold and coloured letters. The illustrations and the writing are executed in the taste which began to prevail in the beginning of the sixteenth century, combining classic antiquity with the gothic, and forming a fantastic style usually designated the renaissance. The artist, Mr. James Gensler, of Hamburg, has succeeded in expressing powerfully the proofs of good and friendly feeling, and the vigorous assistance afforded to Hamburg during the calamity of the fire, and has referred to the ancient relations with the mighty empire of Great Britain.

Power Exerted by Birds in their Flight.

The degree in which the wings act in raising the body, or in propelling it thro' the air varies considerably in different animals according to the way in which they are set. Thus, in birds of prey, which require a rapid horizontal motion, the surface of the wings is very oblique, so that they strike backwards as well as downwards, and thus impel the body forwards whilst sustaining it in the air. Such birds find a difficulty in rising perpendicularly; and can, in fact, only do so by flying against the wind; which then acts upon the inclined surface of the wings just as it does upon that of a kite. On the other hand, the lark, quail and such other birds as rise to great heights in a direction nearly vertical, have the wings so disposed as to strike almost directly downwards. It has been estimated that a swallow, when simply sustaining itself in the air, is obliged to use as much force to prevent its fall as would raise its own weight to a height of about twenty feet in a second. Hence, we may form some idea of the enormous expenditure of force which must take place when the body is not only supported but raised and propelled through the air. The osprey is said to fly ninety miles in an hour; and the hawk one hundred and fifty. The swallow and swift pass nearly the whole of the long summer days upon the wing, in search of food for themselves and their hopeless offspring; and the rapidity of their flight is such that they can scarcely traverse less than seven or eight hundred miles in that time, although they go but a short distance from home. The flight of insects is even more remarkable for its velocity in proportion to their size: thus a swallow, which is one of the swiftest flying of the birds, has been seen to chase a dragon fly for some time without success; the insect always keeping about six feet in advance of the bird, and turning to one side and the other so instantaneously, that the swallow, with all its powers of flight and tact in chasing insects, was unable to capture it. SOLOMON SWALLOW.

THE WOMAN HATER.

Solomon Swallow was a bachelor, and somewhat rusty too; but nevertheless he had made up his mind to one thing—that he was the only man living who had acquired any knowledge of the sublime art of taking care of a wife. "All the married men were duffers," was Solomon's constant assertion. There for instance, is my neighbor Tom Tangible; his wife makes a sort of three-legged stool of him; she shoves him in one corner, and then in another, and sits on him and walks on him, in short treats him like nobody in the house, while he, poor man, takes it as easy as though it were the most natural thing in the world. Now, were I only Tom Tangible, I'd first write a series of matrimonial rules, and if Mrs. T. didn't abide by them I'd submit her to the wholesome discipline of brand and water and padlock, and maybe I might brighten her ideas, though her conjugal duties, by the application of a cowhide. And there again are Everard Esay, and Dick Smocks, and a host of others in the same condition—but I'm the boy that will set them all right if they only follow my example, after I have condescended to endow some fortunate female with the legal title of Mrs. Swallow."

Brave Solomon Swallow.

"Well, Solomon," said a neighbor to him one morning, "as you are always boasting of your skill in managing a wife, how comes it that you are not married?"

"Why, because I have not quite perfected my system. You poke your head into the house without making preparation, and hence Mrs. Everluck makes what she likes of you! But I go to work logically. I begin by studying the crude works of Zingabrazo, for the philosophy of making a woman do her tongue. I then read several treatises on the effect of brand and water discipline of making good wives." Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew," furnished me with a few practical lessons. And I am now generalizing all their systems into one which shall carry the way in all future generations, and convert the plague of matrimony into a blessing. In the course of a year or so, (added Solomon) my rules for the regulation of women (I intend to publish it) will be completed, and then I shall take unto me a wife."

And Solomon was as good as his word, for at the age of thirty-five, feeling himself prepared to give battle to any woman in or out of the Amazon, he got married. At this important period, Solomon was a puffy, comfortable-looking fellow as you would meet in a day's walk; for albeit, the crown of his head never stood five feet two from the heels of his boots, he had a corporation that would have done honor to an alderman or even a lord mayor; and his gait (especially when walking with a spring in the likeness of a woman) was as pompous as a Sultan's, while at such times, his countenance always assumed an expression of female familiarity.

The lady whom Solomon had chosen for his trooper, was, apparently, a modest, lamb-like creature, so that the chances were very fair that she would not only be a tractable wife, but that Mrs. Swallow would need no help from his system to make her so. Now Solomon had the forbearance not to interfere with the lady's sayings and doings on her wedding day; nor is it recorded that he assumed any special authority on the first night either; but about six o'clock the next morning, he softly intruded into his sleeping partner, that it was time to get up. "And when breakfast is ready, call me, but be sure you don't burn the toast!"

"Breakfast and toast," said Mrs. Swallow, "what do you mean?"

"Why, my dear—I mean, madam—that I have begun my system."

"And won't you get up too?"

"Yes, when the breakfast is ready, and my stockings aired!"

Mrs. Swallow was about to reply, but she checked herself, as she was about to say much to him on so short an acquaintance; but though in the present instance she did precisely as she was bid, she resolved in her heart that it was the last time she would get up at six o'clock in the morning and prepare breakfast.

At eight o'clock, every thing being ready, Mrs. Swallow called to Mr. Swallow.

"Breakfast is ready, Mr. Swallow."

"Is the toast made?"

"Yes."

"And not burned?"

"No."

"Are my stockings aired?"

"Yes."

"You'll do," quoth Mr. Swallow, and to breakfast he went, having first received the services of the blushing Mrs. Swallow to help him into his inexpressibles.

The breakfast, however, did not turn out to be the thing it was cracked up to be. The toast was done a little too much, and the tea was not done up to enough; the slop bowl was at the wrong end of the tray, and there were several crumbs on the carpet.

These things call for improvement, observed Mr. Swallow.

"The servant hasn't been here this morning," answered his wife.

"Servant?" retorted Mr. Swallow. "I discharged him yesterday. You don't suppose I can afford to keep a servant and a wife too!"

The lady was again posed, and said nothing, but the day had worn to a close before she could bring herself to believe that Mr. Swallow had actually made use of the words servant and wife, in the same sentence.

The next morning at six o'clock, Mr. Swallow again informed his wife that it was time to get up, enjoining his remark with the suggestion that in future she must save him the trouble of reminding her of so necessary a duty.

Mrs. Swallow, however, benefited nothing by this soft insinuation, for at that moment she either was or pretended to be fast locked in the arms of morpheus.

"Don't you hear, Mrs. Swallow?"

But alas, a slightly conscious snore was the only audible response vouchsafed by Mrs. Swallow.

Now this was a ticklish point with Solomon, but he was prepared for it.

What says my system on this? said he to himself, ruminatingly. It says a lazy wife who lies asleep in the morning, may be very profitably reminded of her duty by the judicious application of a needle. And this magnificent idea, a rarely crossed the threshold of his brain pan, than he inserted the point of a needle into his trousers' helmsman's propria persona. As may be expected, the intended effect instantly followed the cause, for the astonished Mrs. Swallow sprang from the bed as though she had been thrown from it by an earthquake, but alas, her agility was but too strikingly manifested, for she not only fell but annihilated poor Mr. Swallow in rolling over him, but she dashed his pit-put level from a nail which suspended it to the wall, and broke the dial.

What a dreadful dream, ejaculated Mrs. Swallow, pressing her head on her aching portions.

What a dreadful reality, shouted Mr. Swallow contemplating the fragile mass of his broken time piece.

Now Mrs. Swallow, said Solomon, seeing that I can't be always awake to call you up in the morning, to eat burnt toast or drink raw tea, &c. it is time that I should begin to instruct you in your duties.

And what are they?

Be silent madame, if you please. Not to talk but to listen, is one of the most important of them.

Proceed, sir.

And Mr. Swallow looked daggers at his beloved for the second interruption, proceeded as follows:

From six to eight you are to get up, dress quietly, so as to create no disturbance—light fire—air shirts and stockings—sweep room—prepare breakfast and announce perfection thereof. Eight o'clock wash dishes, make beds, rub furniture and clean windows. Ten to twelve, go to market, prepare dinner. Twelve till two, devote to dish washing, sweeping up and rubbing furniture. Two till six, spinning, mending shirts and darning stockings. Seven tea. From that till nine a second course of mending and darning—then to bed. And this daily course, madam, with a strict observance of the rules of civility, frugality, decorum, and obedience, may enable you to do honor to the choice of Mr. Solomon Swallow.

Mrs. Swallow listened quietly to the end, and the kindly inquired. And do you really expect this of me, Mr. Swallow?

To be sure I do, responded her spouse.

Then you will be sadly disappointed, for I'll do no such thing.

No!

I've a way to make you.

How!

Spoon diet, locks, chains and cowhides.

Mr. Swallow!

What!

You're a brute.

And Mrs. Swallow threw herself back and looked desperate.

Now this was a climax. Mr. Swallow was called a brute at his own fireside, and by his own wife, which was the worst of all. He, Solomon Swallow, the celebrated founder of the system of Matrimonial Observations, called a brute by no less a person than Mrs. Swallow. At first he was so astonished at such open manifestations of rebellion to his royal will that he could only look askance; but when he came to himself he saw that something must be done at once, or that the field was lost forever.

You called me a brute Mrs. Swallow.

I did, Mr. Swallow.

A brute!

A brute!

I'll go mad and break things, Mrs. Swallow.

As you like, Mr. Swallow.

And Mr. Swallow did go mad, but he had a method in his madness, for he seized the clearest article of dress that was on the table (an old plate with a crack in it) and dashed it into a thousand pieces upon the hearth, as if he was in a terrible passion.

How do you like that, Mrs. Swallow?

Vastly, Mr. Swallow—try it again.

And again did he try it, for he became desperate, and demolished the cream jug.

Now, said the lady, it's my turn, and jumping up she sent the slop bowl to keep company with its two unfortunate table companions.

This of course was too much for Solomon; he snapped asunder the only remaining cord of the little reason he had left, and he slipped his helmsman—we use the word in its most positive term—on the right cheek, but scarcely had the echo of the blow melted into silence, ere the indignant dame had seized the teapot and shivered it to atoms against the devoted head of the devoted Solomon. Nor was this all, for as he was reeling heels over head from the effects of that awful collision, she plied with the remainder of the tea straws, until there was scarcely a bone in his body which had not echoed to the shocks of cups and saucers, and rounds of butter toast.

Unwilling to carry the war on any longer for that day, Solomon gathered himself up as well as he could, and vowing all sorts of vengeance, stuck his pipe into his mouth, his hands in his pockets, and then setting a chair in the middle of the room, he plunked him on it, and commenced whistling a jig to the tune the old crowd did of looking the while as if he could bite a piece out of a griddle without setting his teeth on edge.

His good lady, too, being determined to follow the example of her lord and master in other matters besides breaking, placed another chair back to back with Solomon's, and after providing herself with a novel, sat herself down and began reading, as if there was no such thing as beds to make, or stockings to mend in all Christendom.

Here this affectionate couple sat for six mortal hours, each bent on sitting the other down, and ruminating the while upon the pleasures of their relative positions. But it must be confessed that Mrs. Swallow had the best of the bargain, for independent of Solomon's mangled head, and par boiled neck and shoulders, he was mad that the watch dial and clock key must be replaced; so that the reding of the first chapter of this voluminous system to practice must be attended to with an outlay of at least twenty dollars. This being the case, I may as well be hung for a sheep as a lamb thought he, and with that he rose from the chair—stole softly out of the room, and turned the key upon the gentle Mrs. Swallow.

The turning of the key made her aware of his intention, when she rushed to the door, but it was too late.

Open the door this instant, Mr. Swallow.

Not until I have kept you seven days upon bread and water, returned the victorious Solomon, and he went on his way rejoicing.

But alas! how onerous is human greatness—in about half an hour he returned to see how matters went on, but had scarcely put his eye to the keyhole than he began to roar like a bull, for Mrs. Swallow had torn every one of his fine linen shirts—(that on his back excepted)—into pieces, to make a rope to let herself down from the window; nor was this all, for upon further examination, he discovered that she had also thrown a variety of chair cushions—bed linen, &c., into the dirty yard to make her descent safe and comfortable.

Oh! chop fallen Solomon Swallow.

The Archives of the Swallows are silent as to the remaining occurrences of this eventful day, but on the next morning about seven o'clock, Mr. Swallow popped his head from under the blankets and said to Mrs. Swallow in the most soothing and imploring tone possible:—Mrs. Swallow, dear, isn't it time to get up?

Yes, returned the lady, and you may call me when you have lit up the fire and put on the kettle.

Poor Solomon! There was no alternative; so he even sat about his work with an alacrity which showed that he had the terror of broken heads and demolished body linen running in his memory. In short Solomon was a conquered man. That day he had to prepare breakfast, sweep the room, &c. The next his assistance was required in rubbing of furniture and making of beds; and before the week was out he was initiated into the mystery of washing coarse towels!

Degenerate Solomon Swallow! Nay in after times, when the little Swallows began to gather about him, it is whispered (as it was intended to) with great interest, we shall probably publish it hereafter.

The appeals are for sale at this office and also at the Mayor's office.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE WESTERN RIVERS.

The prospect of obtaining at the approaching session of congress, aid from the national treasury in the important work of clearing out the obstructions in the great rivers upon which the commerce of the Mississippi valley is floated to market, seems generally to be regarded as better than any other before presented.

It is so, doubtless, and for various reasons, prominent among which is the increased number of delegates by which the west will be represented in the national legislature, and the corresponding diminution of strength which the new appointment shows must be felt by the extreme south and north—the particular sections of country from which, on most former occasions, the deadliest opposition to every thing like liberality to the west in the way of appropriation, proceeded.

The states most immediately interested in the desired improvements—Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Tennessee, Arkansas and Louisiana—will enter the next congress with a net gain of seventeen members, while that body itself will be diminished, in its aggregate, a like number. This is equivalent to a gain of thirty four votes in favor of western measures, which cannot but be regarded as a fact of the greatest importance, inasmuch as but few of the numerous bills here or there brought forward for the improvement of the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri rivers, were defeated by majorities that could not have been reversed by such an additional vote. The time is evidently near when western interests must cease to be trifled with; and it is safe to predict for the future a less narrow and more liberal policy.

Another ground for indulging in favorable anticipations for the future is furnished in the fact, that within the last year or two a flood of light relative to the wealth, resources and capacities of the Mississippi valley, has been shed upon the public mind, which, while it excites general astonishment, cannot but forcibly impress upon congressmen—even those who in by-gone times have been most

COQUETTING EXTRAORDINARY.

A few days ago, a pair of turtles, seemingly anxious to become united in the sacred bonds of wedlock, made their appearance before one of the clergymen of Glasgow, who, finding the requisite certificates all right, proceeded with the ceremony, until he came to that part of it where the question is put to the bridegroom, if he is willing to take this woman to be his wife? To this necessary query, the man, after considerable hesitation, answered, "No! No!" said the minister, with a look of surprise, "for what reason?" "Just," said the poor embarrassed simpleton, looking for the door, "because I've taken a scunner (disgust) at her." On this the ceremony, to the evident mortification of the fair one, was broken off, and the parties retired. A few days after, however, they again presented themselves, before his reverence, and the fastidious bridegroom, having declared that he had got over his objection, the ceremony was again commenced, and proceeded without interruption, till a question, similar to the above, was put to the bride, when she, in return, replied in the negative.

What is the meaning of all this? said the clergyman, evidently displeased at the foolish trifling of the parties. "O nothing," said the blushing damsel, raising her head with an air of resentment, "only I've just taken a scunner at him!" The two again retired to their lonely pillows, and lonely it would seem they had found them, for the reverend gentleman, on coming out of his house the following morning, met the foolish couple once more on their way to solicit his services. "It's a' made up too," said the smiling fair one. "O yes," said the minister, "it's a' settled now, and we want you to marry us as soon as possible." "I will do no such thing," was the grave and stirring reply to the impatient request. "What for?" asked they, speaking in a tone of mingled surprise and disappointment. "O nothing," said his reverence, passing on his way, "but just I've been taken a scunner at ye both!"—[Kilmarnock Journal.

WOOD! WOOD!!

WE would respectfully notify those who have promised us wood, that we are in want of it; and if they are as willing to fulfill as they were to make promises, we shall be supplied with an abundance of this indispensable article soon.

Persons wishing to become subscribers to the Times and Seasons, or Neighbor, can now have the opportunity of doing so by leaving their names at our office, and forwarding the amount in wood.

Also, Pork, Flour, Corn meal, Potatoes and most kinds of grain, taken on subscription.

TAYLOR & WOODRUFF.

A public meeting was called on Monday evening for the purpose of reading a memorial to congress, for the purpose of seeking redress for grievances sustained in the State of Missouri. The address will hereafter be published.

At an early hour the house was crowded to overflowing, and great numbers had to go away for want of room.

As soon as the meeting was opened, they called for the reading of General Smith's "Appeal to the Green Mountain Boys," which was read by W. W. Phelps, after which P. P. Pratt read an address to the "Empire State" of New York, and Dr. Richards was called upon to read the memorial before alluded to.

General Smith then arose, and in his happy, eloquent, masterly manner, delivered one of the most powerful interesting addresses that we ever heard; he spoke for two hours and a half, and was listened to with breathless silence by all present. To attempt to give even a faint outline would be superfluous suffice it to say that all were gratified, instructed and riveted to the spot. Two gentlemen from Missouri were present on the occasion, and we think that if they possessed the least spark of intelligence, the vivid glowing color, which the inhuman deed of Missouri, was painted, must have made them feel that they were living on a polluted soil, and associated with a degraded bloody herd.

His address to the Green Mountain Boys is a masterly piece, and will be read (as it was intended to) with great interest, we shall probably publish it hereafter.

The appeals are for sale at this office and also at the Mayor's office.

IMPROVEMENT OF THE WESTERN RIVERS.

The prospect of obtaining at the approaching session of congress, aid from the national treasury in the important work of clearing out the obstructions in the great rivers upon which the commerce of the Mississippi valley is floated to market, seems generally to be regarded as better than any other before presented. It is so, doubtless, and for various reasons, prominent among which is the increased number of delegates by which the west will be represented in the national legislature, and the corresponding diminution of strength which the new appointment shows must be felt by the extreme south and north—the particular sections of country from which, on most former occasions, the deadliest opposition to every thing like liberality to the west in the way of appropriation, proceeded. The states most immediately interested in the desired improvements—Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, Tennessee, Arkansas and Louisiana—will enter the next congress with a net gain of seventeen members, while that body itself will be diminished, in its aggregate, a like number. This is equivalent to a gain of thirty four votes in favor of western measures, which cannot but be regarded as a fact of the greatest importance, inasmuch as but few of the numerous bills here or there brought forward for the improvement of the Mississippi, Ohio, and Missouri rivers, were defeated by majorities that could not have been reversed by such an additional vote. The time is evidently near when western interests must cease to be trifled with; and it is safe to predict for the future a less narrow and more liberal policy.

Another ground for indulging in favorable anticipations for the future is furnished in the fact, that within the last year or two a flood of light relative to the wealth, resources and capacities of the Mississippi valley, has been shed upon the public mind, which, while it excites general astonishment, cannot but forcibly impress upon congressmen—even those who in by-gone times have been most strenuous in their opposition—that the claims of the west to a more equitable distribution of the appropriations annually made by the general government are founded on strict justice. The inland commerce of the Mississippi valley, all of which is floated down the Mississippi river, New Orleans, is ascertained to exceed that of New York, Philadelphia and Boston, combined; and the tonnage employed in conveying this vast amount of produce to market is not less than the entire tonnage of the Hudson river, upon the basis of which is a basis to market all the freight of the state of New York, and half of that of Vermont, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan and Wisconsin—a rig on stated to be at least two hundred thousand miles square in extent. The manifest injustice of continuing longer to neglect this vast and rapidly increasing inland trade being once made apparent, it would but illy comport with the character of a good government to persist in dispensing its favors with a partial hand; and we apprehend that such will not be the result. It is a fact easy of demonstration that the burthen of the government falls with disproportionate severity upon the inhabitants of the west; and it seems peculiarly hard that they should be denied, as they unquestionably have been, the privilege of sharing equally in its benefits and favors. They ask nothing as a gratuity, but simply claim that which is clearly their due, and which has already been too long withheld. The rivers upon which their surplus produce is borne to market have all, to a greater or less extent, obstructions, which render their navigation of certain seasons extremely dangerous to property, and perilous to life. The removal of these obstructions is what they desire, and what, in consideration of its clearly national importance, they have a right to demand.

The people of Iowa have a common interest in the general improvement of the western rivers, but the removal of the obstructions the navigation of the Mississippi, prevented by the Des Moines and Rock river rapids is to them a matter of special concernment. These works, we presume, will be put upon an equal footing with the other improvements asked for, and doubtless will share the same fate. Should an appropriation be made toward them—as, for reasons already stated, we incline to the opinion will be the case—it is of great importance that the sum set apart should be liberal in amount. The appropriations heretofore made to these works have been so stinted that they have generally been consumed to making the necessary preparations for the prosecution of the work, and it will be so again unless the policy is changed, and a sum more than sufficient to defray the expenses of the works, is appropriated. The money already expended upon these works, at various periods, has been absolutely thrown away. [Burington Gazette.

ARREST OF O'CONNELL.

"The English Government is rapidly filling up the measure of its iniquity. The future historian of the times in which we live, will point to this arrest of O'Connell by the Lord-Lieut. of Ireland, as the proximate cause of a mighty revolution, which shall set free from Saxony the 'greenest Isle of the ocean.' We do not say—we do not believe—that the immediate result of the arrest of Mr. O'Connell will be an uprising of the people of Ireland; but in this act we see a demonstration on the part of the British Ministry to crush by physical force the growing spirit of Liberty in the Irish nation. In this determination we see a urgency of fate to the English Government, darker than that which visited the house of Bourbon in the close of the last century.

The men who have held the helm of State in Great Britain for the last half century have contrived and guided that mighty machine—sprawling itself over all the globe—with an energy and political sagacity to which the history of the world furnishes no parallel. Continually increasing difficulties and embarrassments have been met with a corresponding increase of skill and prudence in the administration of the Government, till the intelligent spectator of the strife has been filled with astonishment, at the address and ingenuity of the expedients by which the most imminent dangers have been averted. But as the most skillful physician, though for years he may repel the encroachments of the great enemy, must eventually yield his patient to that death whose seeds were in his constitution at birth; so those consummate politicians, who for years have sustained—have gilded into even energetic action—the declining vitality of this Government, must yield at length (and soon we believe) to that inevitable death whose seeds were in the British Constitution from the first.

The most prudent and sagacious of all the ministers the British Throne has ever called around it, is the present Premier. But the difficulties of his situation are beyond even his strength. The defection of the Clergy in Scotland—Chartism and the Anti-Corn Law troubles in England—the disturbances of "Rebecca" and her daughters, in Wales—he exasperating effects of the war in Asia—and last and chiefest, the great Repeal agitation in Ireland—are threatening evils, whose fatal consequences no human wisdom can avert.

We have all noticed the careful and cautious manner in which the Premier has heretofore managed the difficulties in Ireland. Let to himself, Sir Robert Peel would, undoubtedly, have continued that policy; but an English Minister, like an American Secretary, is subject to influences which he cannot control. Earl Grey, and the high Tory Lords, are for coercive measures. They have in events which concern Peel less than themselves. He knows, well—he has declared it—that the course which they would pursue, would destroy the Government. He, therefore, though the head of a Tory Ministry has inclined to liberal measures, and completed the larger part of the Tory party to go with him. But a Tory party, or faction of the Tory party, calling themselves "Young England," have turned the scale against him in his own party; and it is the influence of this faction, joined with the old high Tory leaders, which has driven Sir Robert Peel to sanction (as he no doubt has sanctioned) the arrest of O'Connell.

The reason, then, of the illomen which we saw in the act of Lord Grey, was that it indicated the triumph of a liberal and short sighted policy of the high Tory faction over the policy of the more moderate or the present ministry. If England employs the sword to crush the Repeal agitation in Ireland, she will fail, and the whole west of Europe will be plunged in civil war. As an earthquake passes, and once flourishing cities are sunk forever; so will that revolution pass over the west of Europe, leaving behind no traces of its present government.

Evenly should every friend of humanity hope that the dreadful calamity of civil war may not again desolate Europe; but if it must be, let it man child us for rejoicing in the effect it must ultimately produce on the construction of the civil organization of society. And let no man charge us with delighting in blood, if we call upon every lover of Democracy, whether American or Irish, to lift up his voice against the bold outrage of human rights of which the Lord-Lt. of Ireland has been guilty. Nay, if we call on the friends of liberty and repeal to assemble in mass meetings, and by resolutions and through the public press, to hunt back to the haughty mistress of the sea, the voice of their indignation as the voice of a oceanic storm. Let the R-poles—aye, the whole American people—answer this unconstitutional and tyrannical act, in thundering tones of condemnation. Let Liberty and Truth, borne on the crest of its restless wave of public opinion, sweep triumphantly over the Emerald Isle, dashing down the time-honored strongholds of tyranny and wrong, and setting free her noble sons from the vassalage of Saxon lords.

Will not the Marshall Repeal Association call for an indignation meeting, that the voices of true freemen may be heard here in the cause of liberty?"

Consequence of Mob.—The Philadelphia Ledger says: "Yesterday, in the Supreme Court, in the suit of J. Harper & Son against the country, for damages on account of the destruction of their brick works, some months ago by the mob, the jury gave a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs for the sum of $3,758 54. So much for an indemnity law."

Curious Colloquy.—A Surprise.

A correspondent of a late London Times, relates the following anecdote:—A decent farmer's wife, traveling up town from Oxford, addressed a gentleman opposite to her: "Ah, sir, these are sad times; what is to become of us? That dreadful Dr. Pusey sacrifices a limb every Friday."

"Gentleman," (added, madam), "I cannot believe it you must be misinformed."

"Oh no, sir, I assure you I have it from an able authority."

Gentleman, "Again, madam, I must beg to contradict it."

"Well, sir, you are welcome to do as you like, but the doctor himself could not convince me that it was not so."

Gentleman, "Madame, I am Doctor Pusey."

Magnetic Attraction.—A remarkable phenomenon occurred a few days ago on the Brighton Railway. A gentleman and lady were sitting opposite to each other, the lady having a piece of court plaster on her lip. On unmarking from one of the dark tunnels, marvellously to relate, the court plaster was observed to have passed over to the gentleman's lip.

Why are printers more likely to succeed in a suit than any other men? Because they go to work with stick in hand, and a tend to the case with so much compulsion, and press the matter so closely that they are pretty sure to make an impression.

Defence of the Dog.—Is the dog called filthy? He is much less so than certain men of your acquaintance and mine. Is he excommunicated against as greedy? I should like to see you, refuted his advocate, if you only had a single mess for your dinner, and some one attempted to snatch it away. St. Chrysostom speaks of the dog as fawning on you when you face him, and slyly biting you when your back is turned. I ask pardon of St. Chrysostom, says his defender, "but he has libelled the dog; I have known, and still know, many men of this description, but never a dog." At least, then, he is a thief. "No," says he, "he has no idea of meat and tam; and, if you will but touch him, you may have him to sleep when he is famished, near a roasted fowl. Moreover, he is often accused of theft; he has never committed. The servants charge him with their iniquities, and he has no tongue to defend himself."—[Blaze's History of the Dog.

Where you ought to have been. A clergyman who is in the habit of preaching in different parts of the country, happened to be at an inn, where he observed a horse jockey trying to take in an honest man by imposing upon him a broken winded horse for a sound one. The parson knew the bad character of the jockey, and taking the gentleman aside, told him to be cautious of the person he was dealing with. The gentleman finally declined the purchase, and the jockey, quite nettled, observed, Parson, I had much rather hear you preach than see you privately interfere in bargains between man and man, in this way. Why, replied the parson, if you had been where you ought to have been last Sunday, you might have heard me preach. Where was that inquired the jockey. In the State Prison, returned the clergyman.

The Fork-grinder.—Forks are either forged or cast. By the former process they are hammered into the required form; by the latter, the metal, in a liquid state, runs into moulds having the impression of the article, and thus it is at once fashioned. The forged fork is durable and useful. The cast fork is brittle and useless, and may be regarded as a gross imposition upon the purchaser. The former is often made of the best steel, the latter of the latest metal. It is computed by good authorities that about half the forks are cast, hence some idea may be formed of the forgery which is practised upon the public, for indeed, it deserves no milder term. The next step in the manufacture is grinding, and this is performed always on a dry stone. Several articles of cutlery are, in the first place, ground on a dry stone, and afterwards on a wet one. The former is a more expeditious operation than the latter, as well readily be conceived. Fork-grinding is always performed on a dry stone, and in this consists the peculiarly destructive character of the branch. In the room in which it is carried on, there are generally from eight to ten individuals at work, and the dust which is breathed, composed of the fine particles of stone and metal, rises in clouds and pervades the atmosphere to which they are confined. The dust which is thus every moment inhaled, gradually undermines the vigor of the constitution, and produces permanent disease of the lungs, accompanied by difficulty of breathing, cough, and a wasting of the animal frame, often at the early age of twenty-five. Such is the destructive tendency of the occupation that grinders in other departments frequently refuse to work in the same room; and many sick clubs have an especial rule against the admission of dry grinders generally, as they would draw largely on the funds from frequent and long continued sickness. NAUVOO NEIGHBOR:----Extra.

Nauvoo Hancock County, Illinois, Dec. 9, 1843.

At a meeting of the citizens of Nauvoo, held near the Temple on the 7th day of December, 1843, Alpheus Cutler was called to the chair and Willard Richards appointed Secretary; whereupon, after the object of the meeting was stated, a committee of three, namely, W. W. Phelps, Reynolds Cahoon and Hosea Stout, were appointed to draft a preamble and resolutions, expressive of the sentiments of the people of the City of Nauvoo, relative to the repeated unlawful demands by the State of Missouri for the body of General Joseph Smith, as well as the common cruel practice of kidnapping citizens of Illinois and forcing them across the Mississippi river, and then incarcerating them in the dungeons or prisons in Missouri; and after a few minutes absence, they returned with the following:

Whereas the State of Missouri, with the Governor at the head, continues to make demands upon the Executive of Illinois for the body of General Joseph Smith, as we verily believe, to keep up a system of persecution against the Church of the Latter-Day Saints; for the purpose of justifying the said State of Missouri in her diabolical, unheard of, cruel and unconstitutional warfare against said Church of Latter-Day Saints, and which she has practised during the last twelve years, whereby many have been murdered, mobbed, and ravished and the whole community expelled from the State.

And also to heave dust in the eyes of the nation and the world, while she, as a State, with the government to back her, continues to slip over the river and steal the property of the Latter-Day Saints and kidnap the members of said church to glut the vengeance, malice, revenge and avarice; and to make slaves of the said captives or murder them, Therefore

Resolved unanimously, as we do know that Joseph Smith is not guilty of any charge made against him by the said State of Missouri; but is a good, industrious, well meaning, and worthy citizen of Illinois, and an officer that does faithfully and impartially administer the laws of the State, that we, as citizens of Illinois, crave the protection of the constitutions and laws of the country as an aegis to shield him, the said General Joseph Smith, from such cruel persecutions, beseeching the Governor of Illinois not to issue any more writs against the said General Joseph Smith, or other Latter Day Saints, (unless they are guilty,) but to let the Latter-Day Saints 'breathe awhile like other men' and enjoy the liberty guaranteed to every honest citizen by the Magna Charta of our common country.

Resolved, That as citizens of the State of Illinois, we solicit the attention of the Governor and officers generally of the State, to take some lawful means and measure to regain the citizens that have been kidnapped by the Missourians, and to prevent the said Missourians and Government from committing further violence upon the citizens of Illinois.

Resolved, as the sense of this meeting, that, according to the true meaning of law, that those citizens of any section of country, who do not rise up as virtuous freemen, (when any portion of inhabitants, congregate, or combine to injure, slander or deprive another portion of their rights,) and magnify the law, to clear themselves from such unhallowed attempts to subvert order and law, that they by their silence make themselves accessories of the crime of such unlawful assemblage or outrageous individuals.

Resolved unanimously, That we solicit the Governor, by all honorable means to grant us peace for we will have it.

ALPHEUS CUTLER, Chairman.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Secretary.

An extra Ordinance for the extra case of Joseph Smith and Others.

Whereas Joseph Smith has been three times arrested and three times acquitted upon writs founded upon supposed crimes or charges preferred by the State of Missouri; which acquittals were made from investigations upon writs of Habeas Corpus; namely, one in the United States Court for the district of Illinois; one in the Circuit Court of the State of Illinois; and one in the Municipal Court of Nauvoo; and whereas a nolle prosequi has once been entered in the Courts of Missouri upon all the cases of Missouri against Joseph Smith and others; and whereas there appears to be a determined resolution by the State of Missouri to continue these unjust, illegal, and murderous demands for the body of General Joseph Smith; and whereas it has become intolerable to be thus continually harassed and robbed of our money to defray the expenses of these prosecutions; and whereas, according to the Constitution of Illinois "all men are born equally free and independent; and have certain inherent and indefeasible rights; among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of acquiring, possessing and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness;" And whereas it is our bounden duty by all common means, if possible, to put a stop to such vexatious law suits and save expense: Therefore

SEC. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, according to the intent and meaning of the Charter for the 'benefit and convenience' of Nauvoo, that hereafter, if any person or persons shall come with process, demand or requisition founded upon the aforesaid Missouri difficulties, to arrest said Joseph Smith, he or they shall be subject to be arrested by any officer of the city, with or without process, and tried by the Municipal Court; upon testimony, and if found guilty, sentenced to imprisonment in the city prison for life, which convict or convicts can only be pardoned by the Governor with the consent of the Mayor of said city.

SEC. 2. And be it further ordained that the preceding section shall apply to the case of every and all persons that may be arrested; demanded or required, upon any charge founded in the aforesaid Missouri difficulties.

SEC. 3. And be it further ordained, that the Jury that makes the presentment, in any case above specified, shall not, nor either of them, act as Jurors on the final trial, but the trial shall be conducted according to the fifth and sixth articles of the amendment to the constitution of the United States.

Passed December 9, 1843.

JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

'AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE U. STATES.'

Article 5.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Article 6.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

An Ordinance to erect a Dam in the Mississippi River, and for other purposes.

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that Joseph Smith and his successors for the term of perpetual succession, are hereby authorized and empowered to erect a dam, of suitable height to propel mills and machinery, from any point within the limits of said city and below the Nauvoo House, and in a proper direction to reach the Island this side of Montrose, but not to interfere with the main channel of the Mississippi river.

SEC. 2. And be it further ordained that the said Joseph Smith and his successors are further authorized to erect north of the aforesaid Island, a dam, pier, or break water, to intersect the sand bar above.

SEC. 3. Be it further ordained that the said Joseph Smith and his successors are also authorized and have full liberty to use the said dam and water for the purpose of propelling mills and machinery, and shall be governed in their rates of toll, and rules of manufactory by ordinance of said city.

SEC. 4. And be it further ordained that the said Joseph Smith and his successors, are further authorized and empowered, to use the space within the limits of the said dam as a Harbor or Basin for Steam Boats, and other water crafts, and for which purpose they may construct docks, wharves and landings, and receive such fees for wharfage as may be regulated by ordinance of said city.

SEC. 5. And be it further ordained that said Joseph Smith and his successors, are further authorized to build an embankment on the East side of the aforesaid

Island, to connect the said dam with the Pier on the north, and to use the top of said dam for a public road or highway, receiving for compensation from those who cross upon it, such rates as may be allowed by ordinance of said city.

Passed December 9, 1843.

JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

The following is the INDEPENDENT opinion of the Nauvoo Legion according to the opinions of the Attorneys General of the State of Illinois:

Springfield, Illinois,

Nov. 30, 1843.

I have examined the claim of J. C. Bennett as Brigade Inspector of the Nauvoo Legion, and it is my opinion that the claim should be disallowed.

The Legislature, in giving authority, for the organization of a body of 'independent military men' at Nauvoo, intended no doubt, that all expenses &c., except 'their proportion of public arms' should be defrayed by the city and its privileged Legion.

They occupy a novel position, disconnected from the military communities, of the whole State, and in no way subject to the regular military officers, possessing an exemption, even, from subjection to the general military laws, with a law making power invested in their own Legion. It is not reasonable to suppose that the Legislature would confer so many exclusive favours, and yet pay those who profit by this condition of things, as much as is paid to regular militia officers.

In the absence of any express provision by law to authorize the payment of the claim, I can see nothing from which an authority of the kind could be derived, and therefore advise accordingly.

J. LAMBORN, Atty. General.

Springfield, Illinois,

Nov. 30, 1843.

Gen. W. L. D. Ewing,
Auditor, &c.,

I have examined the claim of John Bills, Brigade Major of the Nauvoo Legion for services under the 53 Sec. of the militia law, and have arrived at the conclusion that the Nauvoo Legion are not to be considered, as a part of the regular militia of this state, and that the general law has no farther application to them than is expressly provided for in the law authorizing their organization. The law providing for the organization of the Legion, making no provision for the payment of its officers by the state, it is my opinion that the above claim ought not to be audited.

The Legion was organized by the City Council, is subject to their control for the purpose of enforcing their ordinances—it is entirely independent of the general military law, may have a different organization, make laws for its own government & seems evidently designed to sustain the Municipal authorities of Nauvoo. If there are expenses to be paid, the Municipality of which they form a very important element must meet them.

I am, with great respect,

Your obe't servt.,

I. N. McDUGALL.

THE POOR MAN'S WEDDING.

I wed thee, girl, as poor men wed,
To share a lot of toil and care,
No gems will deck our bridal bed,
But Love will strew his roses there,
No cringing slave, no mental throng,
Will seek our nuptial hour's throng;
No weeds will wear us swift along—
For ours is not a Coburg match!

I did not seek thee for thy gold,
For wealth thy fancy might bestow;
My love was not a feeling sold,
For 't was as I am, poor art thou,
I would not wed thee with a tongue to wait,
The lust of Mammon lent no aid;
I do not wed thee to be rich—
For mine is not a Coburg's heir!

Thou dost not take me to thy arms,
By State necessity impelled;
While conscience yields its charms,
To be with humble reverence held,
I chide thee my poor lot to cheer;
To shed a radiance o'er my life,
And not to frown on death's heir—
For thou art not a Coburg wife.

When time the pleasing hope shall give,
That soon a pledge will bless our love,
That in another we shall live—
Another prized offspring above—
No court physician will be fied (Puffed in the public prints) to watch,
Lest some mishap should spoil the bride;
For ours is not a Coburg match!

And when our infant's cry is heard—
Sweet music to a parent's ear—
No flattery foul, no pomp absurd,
Will give the little stranger here.
Thou wilt not mock me with a keep,
Cut babe, by properly styled;
Pears will not rock that babe to sleep—
For ours will be no Coburg child!

Oh, no! our union will not best,
The seal of interest—seal of shame!
But yet our love will be no fair,
Than those who boast a higher name.
For to unite us two to last,
No glowing words and empty smiles;
No nation's name spread on its feet—
For ours, love, are not Royal hearts.

Coburg was the former title of the Queen of England.

PROGRESS OF ETHNOLOGY.

The French Government, like with England has felt a great interest in those parts of Central Asia, which, until a few years ago, have been shut out from European travellers; and has lately sent out a scientific corps under the direction of Mr. Oshon, to explore the regions between Cashmere and Kullistan. His instructions are to collect information relative to the history and geography of these countries, to the affinity existing between the different tribes, their languages, literature and other analogous monuments.

The Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg has recommended an expedition for the purpose of exploring the northern part of Siberia, and especially that tract of country which lies between Turkestan and the Arctic Ocean. The Emperor has made the necessary grant for carrying it into effect.

The academy has just published, at its expense, a Tibetan Dictionary, with Latin and German translations, the work of Dr. Schmidt, one of its members. This dictionary contains 22,000 Tibetan words, and is said to be the only one of that language with translations into European languages. This great work is a most important contribution to philology, inasmuch as the language is supposed to be the parent stock of the monosyllabic languages of Eastern Asia, to which it bears the same relation as the Sanscrit does to those of the Indo-European family of Western Asia and Europe.

In Asia Minor, a new and extensive field for antiquarian research has been laid open since the discoveries of Mr. Fellows in Ancient Lycia a few years since. This gentleman has made two visits to the southern part of that country, or that part embraced in Ancient Lycia and has published the result of his travels in two volumes. All Europe seems to have been aroused by the interesting discoveries made known by this gentleman, so that, at the present moment, there are three distinct expeditions, or parties from England, one from France, and another from Prussia engaged in making researches among the ancient monuments and works of art in that country. One party of English is exploring the region south of Trebizond and along the coast of the Black Sea; Mr. Fellows is at the south, in districts formerly comprised in Caria, Lycia, Pamphylia, Pisidia, &c.; and the third is surveying the coast. Two ships loaded with sculptured marbles, tablets with inscriptions, statues, &c., have lately been sent to England. Mr. Fellows has discovered the sites of eighteen cities not known to modern geographers, the names of which he has ascertained from their inscriptions.

He has found vast quantities of the richest sculptures and architectural fragments, besides many temples in fine preservation. But his most important discoveries are the bilingual inscriptions, Greek and Lycian, by the aid of which, the ancient alphabet has been deciphered and considerable progress made in making out the language. One inscription consists of two hundred and thirty-seven lines. From the traces of paint on the sculptures, it is evident that the art of polychromy was practised there as well as in Greece. The oldest class of their edifices is cyclopean. Next is a class corresponding in character and details of sculptures, with the ancient monuments of Persia; and a third class, which corresponds in all respects with those elegant edifices of Greece, in which are included the Parthenon, Erechtheion, &c.—the age of Pericles or 5th century before our era.

Mr. Fellows has just set out on another expedition for making researches in Ancient Lycia; he will be accompanied by one hundred persons—engineers, carpenters, masons, &c., besides an architect and artist. A government steamer has been placed under his control. Extensive preparations have been made for boxing up and removing to England such works of art as may be thought of value.

Although the sagacity and learning of modern antiquaries and philologists have enabled them to break down the barriers which concealed from us the wonders of Egypt, of Babylon, and of India; and have enabled the scholar to unravel the mysterious language and characters in which they have for ages been hidden—there remain in the heart of Europe, innumerable monuments, works of art, and inscriptions of a nation which flourished a thousand years before the Christian era, which furnished some of the earliest kings of Rome, and which became extinct in the 4th century before the Christian era. We allude to the Etruscans. Numerous as are the inscriptions in their language, it still remains enveloped in obscurity; not the least clue to it has yet been discovered—not a single word can be read. What makes this the more remarkable is, that the letters of our alphabet (the Roman) are formed from them, and have the same value, so that any one may spell the words without difficulty on the monuments of Etruria, who yet does not know their meaning. Among the proper names, are frequently met with some familiar to us in Roman History. The philologists of Europe have vainly tried to make out the language of Etruria; various theories have been proposed, but, when subjected to a rigid test, they all fall to the ground.

During the past year, a new civilization has arisen, who pretends to have discovered the true key to this long lost language, by which it may be read with great facility.

Among the numerous remains of this nation, are a number of bronze plates, filled with inscriptions. These we discovered about a century ago in one of the tombs which had been opened near one of their ancient cities. The inscriptions were deeply cut in regular lines, the letters were well formed, and as perfect as though made but yesterday. These plates, which are known by the name of the Etruscan tables, are the materials on which Sir William Betham, a distinguished Irish antiquarian, has built his theory. The language, he says, is in which they are written, is the Old Irish, as read and spoken some 10 or 1500 years before the Christian era. He gives an exact translation of every word and line, and the whole put together makes out the following history, as brief as we can give it: A maritime expedition was fitted out in Etruria for trading purposes; this expedition sailed along the Mediterranean coast, passed through the Straits of Gibraltar, followed the coast to the north, describing the country as they passed along, until they came to Ireland, where they entered a certain harbor and communicated with the people of the country. The tables embrace several hundred lines, and give all the particulars of the wind and weather, with a full share of poetical fancies to make up the narrative. But the learned author is not content to claim as his countrymen the ancient nation of Etruria—a nation which flourished before the destruction of Troy but he also says the ancient Carthaginians spoke Irish too; and with equal facility he reads Irish inscriptions through his native language.

His work displays considerable ingenuity, and there cannot be a doubt but that he is perfectly correct in his theory, if the language he calls Old Irish is so. It is here the difficulties, for the language he calls Old Irish is unknown to others.

A previous work by the same author, on the origin of the Irish and Welsh, entitled 'The Gael and the Cambri,' is one of learning and research.

were collected by that learned man, and published with translations a few years before his death.

Among the latest contributions to geographical science, we have to notice the light thrown on the geography of Abyssinia and South-east Africa, by the recently-published journals of Messrs. Isenberg and Krapf, members of the English Church Missionary Society, detailing their proceedings in Abyssinia and the adjacent countries, during a period of four years from 1839 to 1842. The difficulties that the mission had to encounter were of eminent utility in extending the sphere of their observation, and the consequent increase of geographical knowledge. When, in 1839, the opposite of the priesthood of the Abyssinian church caused their expulsion from that country, they determined to proceed to Shoa, an independent kingdom to the south-east of Gondar, under the dominion of the Gallas. After many attempts, they at last reached it by an overland journey from Tadjoura, a port on the east coast of Africa, beyond the Straits of Babel Mandel, through a district untraversed by Europeans, and were favorably received. Many journeys were made through the adjacent regions, all equally unexplored, and the results are of great value in extending our acquaintance with African geography. Indeed, these gentlemen have been the first to bring forward correct information regarding that interesting and once celebrated portion of Africa, lying to the south of the Straits of Babel Mandel, to the south-east and south of Abyssinia, and the upper and earlier course of the Bahr el Azrek, or Blue Nile. The language of Abyssinia—the Anharic—as well as that of the Falla tribes, so extensively spread over the southeastern parts of Africa, and hitherto unwritten, received much attention from the missionaries, and since their return to London, several works in each, including grammars and vocabularies of great interest to the ethnological student, have been printed by them. The liberal disposition of the king of Shoa becoming known to the British government in India, (who are almost brought into contact with the African coast at their new settlement of Aden, in Arabia,) Captain Harris, the well-known African traveller, was dispatched on a mission to him, which resulted in the conclusion of a treaty establishing a commercial intercourse between the two countries, and guaranteeing the safety of British subjects and the security of their property.

Captain Harris's narrative of his Eighteen Months' Residence at Shoa is immediately expected, when a great addition to our geographical knowledge may be confidently predicted. Within a few months, tidings have reached Europe, of the result of an expedition sent up the Bahr el Abiad, or White Nile, by Mehemet Ali, Pacha of Egypt; the information thus obtained has an important bearing on South-western Abyssinia, as well as on the country south of Nubia, almost to the line. The scientific facts contained in these various journals, are ably elucidated in a geographical Memoir of Abyssinia and South-east Africa, by James McQueen, Esq., prefixed to Messrs. Isenberg and Krapf's Journals, accompanied by a map by Arrowsmith, which embodies the whole of our knowledge of that interesting country, where the feeble light of existing civilization is threatened with extinction from the unceasing attacks of its barbarian foes. It is worthy of remark, that the progress of research in this quarter tends to the complete vindication of Bruce from the distrust thrown on his statements by those incapable of appreciating the trustworthy spirit of his labors. The official journal of Mehemet Ali's expedition was recently published at Paris, in the Geographical Bulletin. Though conducted, as the names of the officers seem to show, by Arabs, it is a model for similar productions, for accuracy and copiousness of detail. The expedition started from Khartoum, in latitude N. 15°, and consisted of three or four sailing bars and some small canoes, commanded by intelligent officers, and accompanied by 400 men from the garrison of Senaar. The distance that the expedition advanced south of Khartoum, the previous limit of authentic information, was, including the windings of the river, nearly 1300 geographical miles; after which, in latitude N. 3° 31' and long. 31°, the river separated into two branches, the eastern one of which, where they left it, not venturing to proceed any further, was nearly 1800 feet wide, at the height, and very close of the dry season. The progress of the expedition was peaceable, and, with one slight exception, unattended with any violence. The whole country passed through, from Khartoum upward, is a table-land of very considerable elevation, and the views on all sides exceedingly picturesque and beautiful. In proof of the elevation of the country above the level of the sea, it may be observed, that around the bifurcation of the river, trees and foliage were the trees and foliage of European climate; while, to shield themselves from the effects of cold during the night, the inhabitants sleep among warm robes. In short, this may be fairly called the most important expedition of discovery of modern times, and is about to be followed up by the Pacha, who intends to send steamers up the river we have described. From information collected by the expedition, it is rendered probable that the source of the great river Zaire, or Congo, of South-western Africa, is to be found in the same central table-land from whence proceeds the true river Nile. In the progress of discovery, confirmations of the older geographical writers are constantly occurring; the following is one of the most curious. From a very early period of history—as early as the days of Herodotus—it has been stated that in Africa, to the south of Enarea, and near the Equator, there is a country inhabited by pigmies, or a diminutive race of men. Late accounts received from the east coast of Africa, report that such a people have actually been found in nearly the position mentioned, and bordering on a river, most probably the Quillimany, or an early tributary.

A Word of Advice to Females.—We publish the following extract, for the benefit of our fair readers, from the writings of Mrs. Ellis. "As the time of your marriage draws near, you will naturally be led with ease and pleasure into that kind of unlimited confidence with the companion of your future lot, which forms the great charm of married life. But even here a caution is required; for though all the future, as connected with your own experience, must belong to him, all the past must belong to others. Never, therefore, make it the subject of your confidential intercourse to relate the history of your former love affairs, if you have had any. It is bad to allude to them at all, but especially so under such circumstances; and although such details might serve to amuse for the moment, they would in all probability, be remembered against you at some future time, when each day will be sufficiently darkened by its own passing cloud. With regard to all your other love affairs, then, let bygones be bygones. It could do no good to dwell on the past, and it is better to be of his own sex, the more will the mind of your husband dwell upon you with unalloyed satisfaction. On the other hand, let no other ill-divided curiosity induce you to pry too narrowly into his past life as regards affairs of this nature. However close your inquiries, they may still be baffled by evasion; and if it be an important point with you, as many women profess to make it, to occupy an unsullied page in the affections of your husband, it is wiser and safer to take for granted this flattering fact, than to ask whether any other name has been written on that page before."

PUBLIC MEETING.

At a meeting of the citizens of Nauvoo, held near the Temple on the 7th day of December, 1843, Alpheus Cutler was called to the chair and Willard Richards appointed Secretary; whereupon, after the object of the meeting was stated, a committee of three, namely, W. W. Phelps, Reynolds Cahoon and Hosea Stout, were appointed to draft a preamble and resolutions, expressive of the sentiments of the people of the City of Nauvoo, relative to the repeated unlawful demands by the State of Missouri for the body of General Joseph Smith, as well as the common cruel practice of kidnapping citizens of Illinois and forcing them across the Mississippi river, and then incarcerating them in the dungeons or prisons in Missouri; and after a few minutes absence, they returned with the following:

Whereas the State of Missouri, with the Governor at the head, continues to make demands upon the Executive of Illinois for the body of General Joseph Smith, as we verily believe, to keep up a system of persecution against the Church of the Latter-Day Saints; for the purpose of justifying the said State of Missouri in her diabolical, unheard of, cruel and unconstitutional warfare against said Church of Latter-Day Saints, and which she has practised during the last twelve years, whereby many have been murdered, mobbed, and ravished and the whole community expelled from the State,

And also to have dist. in the eyes of the nation and the world, while she, as a State, with the government to back her, continues to slip over the river and steal the property of the Latter-Day Saints and kidnap the members of said church to slay the vengeance, malice, revenge and rancor; and to make slaves of the said captives or murder them, Therefore

Resolved unanimously, as we do know that Joseph Smith is not guilty of any charge made against him by the said State of Missouri, but is a good, industrious, well meaning, and worthy citizen of Illinois, and an officer that does faithfully and impartially administer the laws of the State, that we as citizens of Illinois, crave the protection of the constitutions and laws of the country as an agent to shield him, the said General Joseph Smith, from such cruel persecutions, beseeching the Governor of Illinois not to make any more writs against the said General Joseph Smith, or other Latter Day Saints, (unless they are guilty,) but to let the Latter-Day Saints' breath breathe like other men, and enjoy the liberty guaranteed to every honest citizen by the Magna Charta of our common country.

Resolved, That as citizens of the State of Illinois, we solicit the attention of the Governor and officers generally of the State, to take some lawful means and measures to regain the citizens that have been kidnapped by the Missourians, and to prevent the said Missourians and Government from committing further violence upon the citizens of Illinois.

Resolved, as the sense of this meeting, that, according to the true meaning of law, that those citizens of any section of country, who do not rise up as virtuous freemen, (when any portion of Inhabitants, congregate, or combine to injure, slander or deprive another portion of their rights,) and magnify the law, to clear themselves from such unhalloved attempts to subvert order and law, that they by their silence make themselves accessories of the crime of such unlawful assemblage or outrageous individuals.

Resolved unanimously, That we solicit the Governor, by all honorable means to grant us peace for we will have it.

ALPHEUS CUTLER, Chairman.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Secretary.

An extra Ordinance for the extra case of Joseph Smith and Others.

Whereas Joseph Smith has been three times arrested and three times acquitted upon writs founded upon supposed crimes or charges preferred by the State of Missouri; which acquittals were made from investigations upon writs of Habeas Corpus; namely, one in the United States Court for the district of Illinois; one in the Circuit Court of the State of Illinois; and one in the Municipal Court of Nauvoo; and whereas a nolle prosequi has once been entered in the Courts of Missouri upon all the cases of Missouri against Joseph Smith and others; and whereas there appears to be a determined resolution by the State of Missouri to continue these prosecutions, or to commit Joseph Smith; and whereas it has become intolerable to be thus continually harassed and robbed of our money to defray the expenses of these prosecutions; and whereas, according to the Constitution of Illinois, "all men are born equally free and independent; and have certain inherent and indefeasible rights; among which are those of enjoying and defending life and liberty, and of a quieting, possessing and protecting property and reputation, and of pursuing their own happiness;" And whereas it is our bounden duty by all common means, if possible, to put a stop to such vexatious law suits and save expense: Therefore

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, according to the intent and meaning of the Charter for the benefit and convenience of Nauvoo, that hereafter, if any person or persons shall come with process demand or requisition founded upon the aforesaid Missouri difficulties, to arrest said Joseph Smith, he or they shall be subject to be arrested by any officer of the city, with or without process, and tried by the Municipal Court upon testimony, and if found guilty, sentenced to imprisonment in the city prison for life, which convict or convicts can only be pardoned by the Governor with the consent of the Mayor of said city.

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained that the preceding section shall apply to the case of every and all persons that may be arrested, demanded or required, upon any charge founded in the aforesaid Missouri difficulties.

Sec. 3. And be it further ordained, that the Jury that makes the presentment, in any case above specified, shall not, nor either of them, act as Jurors on the final trial, but the trial shall be conducted according to the fifth and sixth articles of the amendment to the constitution of the United States.

Passed December 8, 1843.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION OF THE U. STATES.

Article 5.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

Article 6.

In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law; and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence.

An Ordinance to erect a Dam in the Mississippi River, and for other purposes.
Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that Joseph Smith and his successors for the term of perpetual succession, are hereby authorized and empowered to erect a dam, of suitable height to propel mills and machinery, from any point within the limits of said city and below the Nauvoo House, and in a proper direction to reach the island this side of Montrose, but not to interfere with the main channel of the Mississippi river.

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained that the said Joseph Smith and his successors are further authorized to erect north of the aforesaid Island a dam, pier, or break water, to intersect the sand bar above.

Sec. 3. Be it further ordained that the said Joseph Smith and his successors are also authorized and have full liberty to use the said dam and water for the purpose of propelling mills and machinery, and shall be governed in their rates of toll, and rules of manufactory by ordinance of said city.

Sec. 4. And be it further ordained that the said Joseph Smith and his successors, are further authorized and empowered, to use the space within the limits of the said dam as a Harbor or Basin for Steam Boats, and other water crafts, and for which purpose they may construct docks, wharves and landings, and receive such fees for wharfage as may be regulated by ordinance of said city.

Sec. 5. And be it further ordained that the said Joseph Smith and his successors, are further authorized to build an embankment on the East side of the aforesaid Island, to connect the said dam with the Pier on the north, and to use the top of said dam for a public road or highway, receiving for compensation from those who cross upon it, such rates as may be regulated by ordinance of said city.

The following is the INDEPENDENT position of the Nauvoo Legion according to the opinions of the Attorneys General of the State of Illinois:

Springfield, Illinois,
Nov. 30, 1843.

I have examined the claim of J. C. Bennett, as Brigadier General of the Nauvoo Legion, and it is my opinion that the claim should be disallowed.

The Legislature, in giving authority, for the organization of a body of 'independent military men' at Nauvoo, intended no doubt, that all expenses, except 'their proportion of public arms' should be defrayed by the city and its privileged Legion.

They occupy a novel position, disconnected from the military communities, of the whole State, and in no way subject to the regular military officers, possessing an exemption, even from objection to the general military laws, with a law making power invested in their own Legion. It is not reasonable to suppose that the Legislature would confer so many exclusive favours, and yet pay those who profit by this condition of things, as much as is paid to regular militia officers.

In the absence of any express provision by law to authorize the payment of the claim, I can see nothing from which authority of the kind could be derived, and therefore advise accordingly.

J. LAMBORN, Atty. General.
Springfield, Illinois,
Nov. 30, 1843.

Gen. W. L. D. Ewing,

Auditor, &c.

I have examined the claim of John Bills, Brigadier Major of the Nauvoo Legion for services under the 53 Sec. of the militia law, and have arrived at the conclusion that the Nauvoo Legion are not to be considered, as a part of the regular militia of this state, and that the general law has no further application to them than is expressly provided for in the law authorizing their organization. The law providing for the organization of the Legion, making no provision for the payment of its officers by the state, it is my opinion that the above claim ought not to be audited.

The Legion was organized by the City Council, is subject to their control for the purpose of enforcing their ordinances—it is entirely independent of the general military law, may have a different organization, make laws for its own government, &c. seems evidently designed to sustain the Municipal authorities of Nauvoo if there are expenses to be paid, the Municipality of which they form a very important element must meet them.

I am, with great respect,
Your obt. servt.,
J. N. McDOUGALL.

THE APPLE-TREE BORER.

We are now able to present to our readers an accurate portrait of this destructive worm in his larva state of existence—in the state in which he exhibits himself under the bark and in the body of the tree.

This worm, in its worm state, probably causes more destruction in our New England orchards than any known animal in existence; and every gardener in the land should make himself fully acquainted with his nature and habits to enable him to put a stop to the depredations which are annually committed on his most valuable trees.

Our recent subscribers should know, and our more early friends should recollect, that this borer attacks the apple tree, the quince, the ash, and the Dr. Harris says, the cherry tree; though we have never seen it in the tree last named. We have numerous cherry trees and we have raised many for sale, but we have not suffered through this worm. Indeed we have never found one in any species of tree in our home orchard, which we often wash with lime. But as we find many gardeners in other places, complaining of the decay of their cherry trees, both in Rhode Island and in the Southern counties of Massachusetts, we advise them to search for this worm in these as well as in their apple and quince trees.

Those farmers and gardeners who neglected to attend to their trees at the right time, the best time in the season, will now do well to examine and destroy all they may find imbedded under the bark. Whether the wash of strong lye which we have so often recommended to be applied in July, after the eggs are laid, will be effectual or not, is not now the question. All agree that bending, straggling, drawing and quivering, burning, hanging in chains, and such mild kinds of punishment as our fathers resorted to in hopes of reclaiming the wicked, will prove ineffectual with these worms.

You will recollect that we have come to the conclusion, after consulting with a great number of experienced and sagacious heads, and looking on the work of their hands, that the insect, in its perfect state—the beetle—the mother of this worm, makes her first appearance on the stage in June, that about the first of June she is in the habit of making provision for her offspring; that she usually lays her eggs, ten in number, on the body of the tree near the surface of the earth, and in this form; not larger than the head of a pin;

o o o o
o o o o
o o o o

that the eggs are hatched out in a little more than eight days, when a white maggot appears; that the maggot burrows into the bark of the tree and proceeds no farther the first season; that during the second year, upward; and that in the third year he is found up eight or ten inches higher than where he commenced; and that in June of the third year he or she comes out of the tree, fully winged, when she is ready to lay more eggs.

These beetles are quite in the day time but they fly from tree to tree in the night. We have caught them on the body of the tree in June. Last summer I. Bartlett, Esq., of Quincy, sent us a very large beetle which he said he caught coming out of the tree on the first day of June.

It is not pretended that these beetles all come out in one week, or that they lay their eggs by any rules in the Almanac; but they all seem to lay their eggs about the first of July. They seem to vary less in the time than the peach borer beetle, for her worms are found in the roots of the peach tree of all sizes up to nearly an inch in length.

Now we advise all those who had not time or faith or hope, in July, to look to their trees and wash them with lye, to see if they find any traces of the maggots just under the bark. They will also be likely to find some of a large growth, as Mr. Hubbard of Abington did, more than one year old. The brood of last July will be found not to exceed one third of an inch in length, while lying in their natural position; this brood may now be destroyed though the labor will be much greater than it would if attended to in season.

The color of the worm is a dirty white body and yellow head. Scalding water, or cold lye strong enough to burn an egg, will kill it if comes in contact with them. The Hon. Wm. Jackson, of Newton, expresses to us some doubts whether lye would operate powerfully enough on the egg before hatching, as the egg is always placed over to protect it from the weather. He places leeches about his own trees, piling them high around the body and taking care to clear away all rubbish and sprouts at the root.

AGRICULTURAL CHEMISTRY.
(Practical and Theoretical.)

NUMBER XI.

ALTERATION OF CROPS AND DISINTEGRATION OF SOILS.

To Agriculturalists:
It has long been observed that the cultivation of annual plants for several successive years on the same soil, greatly impairs their growth; and with some this is the case, in spite of all the manures and composts we add to the land.

Peas, Clover and Flax will not thrive on the same soil for successive years; but Hemp, Rye and Oats may be raised in close succession when the proper manures are employed.

When a soil becomes unfitted for the production of a certain kind of plant, in consequence of its being raised upon it for successive years, it may be well adapted to the growth of another kind; and on this account has been practiced the alternation of crops by successful agriculturalists.

The question now arises, why will not a soil upon which certain plants grow luxuriantly, continue thus to produce them for successive years, when it will produce an abundant growth of another kind? There are two causes for this. One is the abstraction from the soil, by the first crop, of such inorganic matters as it required for its healthy development, but which is not essential for the growth of the other. If this was the only cause of its unfitness to produce the first it might be easily remedied by adding such matters to the land. But another cause exists, which is not removed, except by allowing the soil to remain fallow for a year or more—or, if continued to be cultivated, by an alternation of crops. Plants while growing expel by their roots certain matters which are not necessary for their nourishment, but are actually injurious to them; but they are not so to others, whose natures and demands are different. If this land, thus rendered unproductive, remains uncultivated for some time, the carbonaceous matters expelled by the roots of those crops grown upon it, undergo a chemical change, in consequence of exposure to air and moisture—and is thus converted into humus, which again may render it fertile.

Experience has taught us that the Carbon of a soil is increased by culture; this cannot be received from any other source except the atmosphere; and after going through certain transformations by the plant it is excreted by its roots. The time which this excrementary matter requires for its conversion into humus depends on the composition of the soil and on its porosity. If it be impregnated with lime, the change is quickly effected. Alkalies cause organic matters to absorb oxygen and thus hasten their decomposition. The conversion of this excrement is slow, in soils that contain a large portion of clay. In some soils, clover will not thrive till the sixth, and in others not until the twelfth, and in the second or third year. This depends upon the chemical nature of the soil.

If by raising wheat, on a certain piece of ground, we abstract therefrom the greater part of the silicate of potash, it renders it unfit for further production of this grain; but potatoes, turnips and lucern will now thrive there, because they differ in their composition and demands for inorganic matters. But after two or three years, wheat may be cultivated upon it again to advantage; because during this time the action of water and air will cause the disintegration of silicate or absorbed by the intervening crops, or are converted into humus.

When a soil becomes exhausted, lucern is one of the best crops we can use to enrich it. This vegetable requires but little inorganic matter; and in consequence of the large development of its leaves, and its thrifty growth, it is well fitted to, and does receive a large quantity of nutriment from the atmosphere; and by shading the ground, it prevents the evaporation of its moisture; but retains it, for its own use; therefore its growth is rapid, and the accumulation of organic matter from the air and water is great; and by its organic action much of this is eliminated into the soil through the roots. While all this is going on, the inorganic matters of the soil are being liberated, by the action of air and moisture. Potatoes, beans, clover and turnips may thrive after wheat and corn, and vice versa. By the proper alternation of crops, the soil is rendered more fertile for them that are to follow; that is, if we occasionally add such matters as are removed therefrom by seeds, roots and leaves of plants, and which are used for the food of men and animals.

The reason why the alternation of crops is so advantageous is that the one leaves behind such inorganic matters, or it may eliminate by its roots into the soil such organic excretions as the succeeding crop requires. A soil that contains a considerable number of stones, will wear better than one that is entirely destitute; for by their gradual and continual wearing away, by the action of the weather, and by the friction of the implements of husbandry while working it, those inorganic matters which compose them are thus separated, become intimately mixed with the earth, and are thus reduced to such a state as to be taken up by the process of vegetation. Therefore we would recommend agriculturalists not to remove all small stones from their land, for by remaining, they prove a lasting supply of such inorganic matter as are annually being removed.

JOHN McLEAN.

Jackson, Nov. 10, 1843.

AGRICULTURAL APHORISMS.
Annihilate the implements of husbandry which have been brought into existence in the course of a few hundred years, and the recollection of their uses, and starvation would be the consequence. So in a few hundred years from this time, the then inhabitants of the earth would starve on the practice of our present system of husbandry.

We are all born in the sight of the mountain of plenty, and all desirous of climbing to its summit; but let me tell you, that you can only do this by holding on to a plough or hoe handle. If you attempt to climb up by any other means, you will surely tumble. He who never attempts to climb up this mountain is a brute, he who attains half way, is a man, and he who mounts the summit, is a hero.

With him who has 'learned enough,' I claim no king; nor will I keep his company.

Nature works for the agriculturist while he is sleeping; who else can claim the benefit?

Equally silly is he who is killing his land to fill his purse, with him who kills his goose to get the golden egg. We learn not so much by our own experience as by the experience of others; and it is much easier to procure this by reading than by travelling.

He who seeks more light the more he finds, and finds more the more he seeks, is worthy to be called a sage.

You never saw a vulgar character disinterestedly sensible of the value of time. Neatness begets order.

He who assumes the air of patronage, should know, that unattended by delicacy, his services are affronts.

Prejudice and conceit are the offsprings of ignorance, and the great barriers to agricultural improvement.

A cent expended in money or time, in the promulgation of agricultural knowledge, will add many dollars to the public stock.

Those who exert themselves in the diffusion of agricultural knowledge, receive the approbation of all the real friends of their country.

Nothing injures agriculture more than whimsical novelties, except bigoted adherence to old and bad habits.

If you treat your land badly, it will return the compliment.

Never plant on foul ground to save a ploughing, or on wet ground to save time.

The best way to convert an agricultural bigot, is to put good examples before him, and be silent.

If we make large crops at the expense of our land, it becomes every year more evident that our apparent gain is real loss.

Manure is to a farm what daily food is to an animal; it must be procured at any sacrifice.

It is necessary often to be reminded of what we already know.—Southern Planter.

PUBLIC MEETING.

It will be seen in another column that a public meeting was held in this place for the purpose of providing some remedy for the repeated aggressions of the State of Missouri, since which time an ordinance has been passed by the city council to carry into effect that object, and to prevent the citizens of this place from being any longer imposed upon by the continued illegal proceedings of the State and citizens of Missouri.

We think that it is high time that some thing should be done to screen ourselves from the continued aggressions of this meddling, troublesome, blood-thirsty herd; and we know of no means that will be more efficient and lawful, than the one adopted.

We have done good for evil long enough, in all conscience, we think that we have fulfilled the scriptures every whit. They have smitten us on the one cheek, and we have turned the other, and they have smote that also.

We have also fulfilled the law, and more than fulfilled it; and for the sake of peace when we knew that we had violated no law nor in any wise subjected our selves to persecutions, we have endured the wrong patiently without offering violence or in any wise injuring the heartless wretches who could be trusted with such a dishonorable document. Those vagabonds have been suffered to prowl at large, and boast of their inglorious deeds, in our midst & no man has injured them, or said why do you so. The time however is now gone by for this mode of proceeding, and those vagabonds must keep within their own borders and let peaceable citizens alone or receive the due merit of their crimes. We think that this ordinance passed by the City Council is wise, judicious and well timed, and is well calculated to protect peaceable citizens in their rights, and to prevent those lawless vagabonds from interfering with the rights of peaceable citizens.

To those acquainted with our relationship to Missouri, and the accumulated wrongs, and repeated aggressions that we have received from the hands of that State, our language may appear harsh and ill-timed; but those who are in possession of those facts know better. Their merciless, unrelenting, inhuman, persecutions, and persecutions, from the time of our first settlement in that State until the present, have been wholly and entirely unprovoked, and without the shadow of law. Joseph Smith has been suffered to be taken, time and again by them; we say suffered because he could not be legally and constitutionally taken. Joseph

Smith never committed the crimes of which he is charged; he is an innocent man. But allowing their false, diabolical accusations to be true, what then? Does it follow that he is continually to be followed for the same offence? verily no. The constitution of the United States expressly says, 'nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb.' And yet we find that the State of Missouri has put Joseph Smith in jeopardy no less than four, or five times. He was tried once by a military tribunal in Missouri, and sentenced to be shot. He was afterwards tried by a pretended civil (mobocratic) court, and since then he has been several times apprehended, tried and acquitted for the same offence in this State, by Missouri requisitions. Is he still illegally and unconstitutionally to be held in obedience by these miscreants, or shall we as free born American citizens assert our rights put the law in force upon those lawless, prowling vagabonds and say that he shall be free. Shall we suffer our pockets to be picked through the influence of these scoundrels eternally, by defending ourselves against vexatious law suits, or shall we take a more summary way and by a legal course punish the aggressors, proclaim our freedom and shield ourselves under the broad folds of the Constitution. The latter is the course for us to pursue. The ordinance passed by the City Council will secure this object and we are glad to find that the opinion of J. Lamborn Attorney General and I. N. McDougall, correspond so much with our own. That the Nauvoo Legion is an independent military organization and seems evidently designed to sustain the Municipal authorities of Nauvoo.

What are we to say about those kidnappers who infest our borders, and carry away our citizens? those infernal inhuman shapes.

The whole European world has been engaged in a warfare against those who traffic in human blood. Negotiations have been made, treaties entered into, and fleets have been sent out through the combined efforts of the nations to put a stop to this inhuman traffic; but what would those nations think, if they were told the fact that in America, Republics in America, the boasted cradle of Liberty, and land of freedom, that those dealers in human flesh and blood, Negro dealers and drivers are allowed with impunity to steal white men, and those sons of liberty can obtain no redress. Great God, has it come to this, that free born American citizens must be kidnapped by Negro drivers! What are our authorities brought to justice? We have heard that one or two of the citizens of Illinois have been engaged in assisting these wretches. We shall try to find out who they are and their whereabouts, and make them known, and then if they are not brought to condign punishment, we shall say that justice has fled from Illinois.

DINNER PARTY.

At the request of a large number of citizens, Gen. Joseph Smith proposes having a dinner party, on Christmas day at 1 o'clock P. M. for young ladies and gentlemen. A band of music will be in attendance, and the General and his lady will also be present on the occasion.

In consequence of the numerous calls for a copy of President Joseph Smith's reply to Mr. Bennett's letter, we have been induced to publish it in this week's number of the Neighbor. All the surplus numbers were taken the first day they were issued from the press, so it was with difficulty we could supply our subscribers. The citizens are hereby notified that they can now be supplied with a copy if they wish as a large number of extra copies are struck off.

We are highly gratified to find another branch of business, even that of comb making, added to our list of home manufactures in our flourishing city. We hope that merchants and the citizens in general, will patronize Mr. Hammar in his business. From the acquaintance we have had with him and his business in Philadelphia, and from the specimens of his work which he has left at the Printing Office for examination, we are satisfied that purchasers cannot fail of being suited both with the quality and price of the article.

DREADFUL OUTRAGE AND ATTEMPT AT MURDER.

On Sunday night last the house of Richard Badham, who resides about five miles east of this city, was visited by two ruffians who sought for money, and threatened the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Badham if they would not give it to them. They obtained four dollars and fifty cents a gun and a watch, and stabbed Mr. Badham in the abdomen. His life was almost despaired of, but we are informed that he is in a fair way for recovery. The particulars of the outrage, so far as we are informed, are as follows:

Two men called upon Mr. Badham about midnight, and told him that they had a letter for him from his niece who resides in Macomb. After handing the letter to Mr. Badham, they withdrew for a short time, when Mr. Badham perceived that the letter was fictitious and of course was led to suspect that his visitors had some evil design. They immediately returned, and wanted to stay with him for the night, but he refused them admittance; they however insisted, and forcibly rushed into the house, where upon he seized a poker and struck one of them, upon which a scuffle ensued, and Mr. Badham being overpowered they tied his hands behind him, and proceeded to search the house for money which they said they had been informed he possessed to a large amount. Having failed in their object they threatened him that if he would not inform them where his money was they would kill him; he still persisted that he had no money, upon which one of the parties led Mr. Badham out on the prairie telling him that he had his money hid out on the prairie, and that if he would not discover it he would kill him, the other ruffian, in the mean time stayed with Mrs. Badham with a drawn bowie knife threatening to kill her if she made any alarm. After two fruitless attempts to discover his money by leading Mr. Badham into the prairie, he was taken to his house. Mrs. Badham was then threatened by the villains, that if she would not discover to them their money, they would kill her. She stated however, that all they possessed was four dollars and a half, which she handed to them, whereupon the heartless wretches disappointed in their expectations struck Mr. Badham in the abdomen with a bowie knife, and left him in that situation. The ruffians had thought she recognized the voice of one of them, as being a stranger who had stayed with them over night a few nights before. They had given the stranger some information concerning their niece, from which it is supposed they had conceived the idea of obtaining an introduction through the medium of a letter from their niece. Dr. Birchfield was immediately sent for, and rendered all the medical assistance that lay in his power. We are happy to say, that there is some prospect of his recovery. There has no clue as yet been given to the discovery of the scoundrels.

Since the above was put in type, we have learned the following particulars from Dr. Birchfield. The ruffians had a bag with a strong cord drawn round the mouth which they attempted to put into the head of Mr. Badham, to prevent his speaking, or giving any alarm; but they failed and tore his shirt from his back in the scuffle, and when one of the villains laid him out he shouted to alarm the neighbors and he was then stabbed. He also informed us that one of the men was about twenty or twenty five, and the other was an aged man; that Mrs. Badham supposed that both of them had been at their house before; that the old man came professing to be sick, and that she had made some coffee for him, and administered to his wants; that he had made several enquiries relative to their circumstances; but that she was not able fully to recognize them; on account of their faces being blackened. We hope the scoundrels may be detected, and brought to condign punishment.

A Woman and 6 Children lost in the Mountains.

We learn from the Hollydaysburg Pa. Register, that Miss Rebecca Ginter, and six children, in Clearfield county, in that State, recently went out in the woods to gather berries and unfortunately became bewildered and rambled about two days and nights in the cold and rain, and at length laid themselves down perfectly overcome with cold and hunger, when they were found by a detachment of citizens who were in search of them.

Le Journal des Chemins de Fer announces that the Directors of the Rouen and Havre Railroad Company have just concluded, with M. M. Mackenzie and Brassey the most important contract ever made in France. The principal works of the Havre Railroad are the bridge of Rouen, seven tunnels of an extent of 6,500 yards, and a viaduct of 27 arches in the valley of Barentin, being 33 yards in height from the arch to the centre. These works will cost from 13,000,000fr. to 14,000,000fr. They are to be entirely completed in May, 1846.

A letter from Pagan, of the 9th ult, in the Augsburg Gazette, states that the investigation respecting the gun or pistol said to have been fired at one of the carriages of the suite of the Emperor of Russia is actively going on; but that a general opinion prevails that the servant who sat at the back of the carriage had fired a gun himself, either accidentally or for the purpose of creating a sensation.

According to the letters from Ancona, a volcano appeared last month in the rocky island of Melada, situated in the Adriatic near Ragusa. On the night of the 15th, eruptions from seven distinct craters were observed.

Liverpool Nov. 4.—One of the most striking domestic events of late years is the result of the city of London election. It has astonished both parties. The commercial metropolis of the world has unequivocally declared its adherence to those principles of free trade which have been recently promulgated with such energy by Messrs Cobden, Bright, and others.

The result has placed the Free Trade theory on a higher point of elevation than ever it stood before.

Not far removed on the same topic is the speech on practical farming, which Sir Robert Peel has been addressing, through his tenantry, at Tamworth, to the agriculturists of the United Kingdom. The speech sounds the approach of great and speedy changes in what is called 'protection to agriculture.' There is no direct allusion to the Corn Laws, but his earnest exhortation to all engaged in husbandry to depend upon themselves alone—No study agricultural chemistry, so as to defy competition—and to remember that the success of manufacturers, in the large towns, is the level which raises the price of the farmers' produce—is so like the language of the free traders as to make the same class of men, as to render his meaning very transparent.—[Wilmer & Smith's Times.]

The vote as officially declared, were for Mr. Pattison 5522, Mr. Baring, 5307.

IRELAND.

Ireland continues quiet. The country is extensively occupied by troops—in fact the whole available force of the British Army has been thrown into it—the agitation, somewhat subsided in tone, but equally effective in action, continues. The repeal efforts are awaked by thousands weekly—the much talked of Conviction Hall has been opened—two or three men of mark have joined the movement just at the moment it became critical.

Reports gain ground in Dublin that Sir Robert Peel contemplates some compromise policy in respect to Irish grievances. The Dublin correspondent of the Morning Chronicle asserts that an official gentleman, who has been at work for six months, is engaged in completing by the next session of parliament, an elaborate statement of the revenues of the Irish Church establishment, arranged in a tabular form, embracing each individual parish, and specifying the income of the incumbent, the number of the Protestant parishioners, whether or not there is a church in the parish and other details. Speaking of the relations of landlord and tenant, the Pilot says: 'Already preparations are being made to legislate on the subject. A commission is about to be appointed to make the necessary inquiries; and the annals of that project may be judged by the fact that the chairman is likely to be a Catholic member of Parliament, with power to appoint his own secretaries. We believe Lord Eliot will not contradict us—verily, the Canadian policy is about to be adopted. Oh that it may not be too late!'

O'Connell has issued a new address, in which he says: 'Prosecution never yet extinguished a great public cause. Prosecution may or may not retard, but they cannot terminate the struggles to obtain ameliorated institutions. There were several prosecutions in order to extinguish the struggle for emancipation. Yet emancipation was triumphantly carried. There were unnumbered prosecutions to extinguish the cause of Parliamentary Reform. Yet a large installment of Parliamentary Reform was nevertheless triumphantly obtained. The present prosecutions may be intended to extinguish the cause of Repeal. As well may a school-boy's rattle be used to overpower the thunder of the ocean waves.'

Dropping figurative language, I can assert in firm sobriety and truth, that the pending prosecutions, even should they delay, yet they cannot possibly prevent the attainment by the Irish nation of their right to a domestic Parliament; but on the contrary, their effect must be to increase the necessity for the existence of the Irish Legislature—in other words for the repeal of the statute of the 40th of George III. c. 88.

People of Ireland be patient be persevering. Follow out the experiment in which we are now engaged, to obtain our political objects by peaceful means. It is a noble experiment, that of endeavoring to obtain the restoration of political franchises and rights by the use of means strictly and exclusively peaceable and legal.

Rally round me in this noble experiment, this glorious struggle. Be not unshaken—be not [oh! need I say it] be not dismayed.

Peace, order, tranquility, these are our aims. With these we are certain of success.

Persevere, and your country will be a nation again, indissolubly connected with Great Britain. But legislating for herself. Persevere firmly and peacefully and the Republic is certain.

I am and always will be, your ever faithful servant.

NAUVOO SEMINARY.

Mr. Editor:—On Friday last, through the politeness of Mr. Joseph M. and Miss Adelia Cook, I received an invitation to attend a public examination at their seminary.

Quite a number of our citizens were in attendance, and appeared to be well pleased with the order of their exercises during the afternoon. Various questions were propounded on Astronomy, Geography, Arithmetic and Grammar, which were answered with readiness by the pupils, which proved that the instructors had used every exertion to cultivate the minds of those who had been placed under their care, and give them a knowledge of the different sciences which so much interest, and which are so well calculated to adorn the mind with all those accomplishments that tend to benefit and happily the condition of mankind, and polish it with all those glittering gems which elevate it far above the darkening clouds of ignorance which impede the human intellect and chain it to the detestable car of error, barbarism and superstition.

The centre table was then loaded with compositions written by the pupils, on the subject "Does the Merchant enjoy a greater degree of happiness than the Farmer?" The question was carefully discussed on both sides; but if we were allowed to express our opinion upon the merits of the arguments adduced, we should be compelled to decide in favor of the ——— side of the question.

After the exercises were concluded, Sidney Rigdon, Esq., was called upon, who addressed the school in a very appropriate and able manner.

The pupils of the Nauvoo Seminary numbered about 133.

Yours Respectfully,

OTHELLO.

ENIGMA EXTRAORDINARY.

It is formed like the globe, and is placed in its center.

It commands every tongue, every mouth it will enter.

It is always in fashion, the first to be odd.

It departs not from home, yet it wanders abroad.

It glows in each kingdom and in every soil.

It is found, too, of late, the partner of toil.

It appears in the ocean, belongs to all nations.

It has many connections and worthy relations.

It presides over the ocean, reigns likewise on shore.

It tends every object, it enriches our store.

It attends all our actions, directs every enemy.

It twines one into two, hates men and loves women.

It is seen in the morning, gets brighter at noon.

It is hid in the sun, bright it shines in the moon.

It is shown in the rainbow, likewise in the dew.

It will follow our footsteps wherever we go.

It is slumbered in the palace, beaved in the cot.

It is found in our bosom, wherever we lay.

It rules in accounts when we balance our copy.

It is every order, whatever be our efforts.

It is sure to be foretold on every occasion.

The butcher and his calf.—A butcher, who had purchased a calf, sat with it on a horse at a public house door, on which a shoemaker remarkable for his drollery, observing and knowing he had to pass through a wood, offered to the landlord to slant the calf for a glass of grog; the landlord agreed, and the shoemaker set off and dropped one shoe on the path near the middle of the wood; and another a quarter of a mile from it. The butcher saw the first shoe, but did not think it worth getting down for; however, when he discovered the second, he thought the pair would be an acquisition, and accordingly dismounted, tied his horse to the hedge, and walked back to where he had seen the first shoe. The shoemaker, in the mean time, unstrapped the calf, and carried it across the fields to the landlord, who put it into his barn. The butcher, missing his calf, went back to the inn, and told his misfortune, at the same time observing that he must have another calf, cost what it would, as the real was bespoken. The landlord told him he had a calf in the barn, which he would sell him; the butcher looked at it, and asked the price; the landlord replied, "give me the same price you did for the calf you lost, as I think this is full as large." The butcher would not allow it by any means to be as good, but gave him within six shillings of what the other cost, and accordingly put the calf in a second time across his horse. Crispin, elated with his success, undertook to steal the calf again for another glass of grog, which being agreed, he posted to the wood and hid himself, where, observing the butcher come along, he bellowed so like a calf, that the butcher, conceiving it to be the one he had lost, cried with joy, "Ah! are you there! Have I found you at last!" and immediately dismounted and ran into the wood. Crispin, taking advantage of the butcher's absence, unstrapped the calf, and actually got back with it to the publican before the butcher arrived to tell his mournful tale, who attributed the whole to witchcraft. The publican unravelled the mystery, and the butcher, after paying for, and partaking of a crock's worth of punch, laughed heartily at the joke, and the shoemaker got great applause for his ingenuity.

Fruit Trees.—Since I have been in your State, I have heard much complaint about fruit being destroyed during the winter season. Various things have been proposed as preventatives, and it is very important that something should be found adequate to remove the evil. I do not pretend to have sufficient experience in horticulture to be able to prescribe, but merely place myself in the attitude of an inquirer: I will venture however to suggest a remedy which I heard from an experienced cultivator of fruit.

When there is a good body of snow on the ground, scrape it away from under the trees if the ground was not thoroughly frozen before it fell; and after the ground has become frozen, scrape it back again, and as much more on the top of it as you please; then cover it with straw, leaves, or something else which will prevent the snow from melting when there comes a thaw. This keeps the trees from immaturely putting forth buds, which the first frost will destroy.

LOST.
ABOUT six weeks ago a company of saints arrived in this place escorted by Elder Wandal who had in his charge a trunk belonging to Jane Elizabeth Manning. Sister Manning was not here then but has since arrived and can obtain no intelligence of her trunk; it is presumed that some one has got it in mistake as there was a number of passengers arrived at the same time. The trunk is about three feet long and covered with a light hair skin, with the exception of the back, on which there is some white. It is directed Jane Elizabeth Manning, Nauvoo. Whoever will give such information as shall lead to the discovery of the trunk will be handsomely rewarded by applying to this office.

TO THE AFFLICTED.
WHERE is the Good Samaritan? Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr James M. Martin! Inquire for Dr James M. Martin's Inevitable remedy for the cure of Fevers. For Dr James M. Martin's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills. For Dr James M. Martin's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills. For Dr James M. Martin's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine. For Dr James M. Martin's Cephalic Snuff, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that, in their curative virtues may be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having reached riper years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr James M. Martin is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fondest expectations; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by all future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

SEE HERE!

CHEAP BOOT AND SHOE MANUFACTORY!!

The subscriber would respectfully inform the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity that he intends to manufacture Boots and Shoes much cheaper than has been done heretofore in this city. He would also inform the farmers that he will take hides and produce in part pay.

He returns his thanks to the public generally for the liberal patronage heretofore extended, and hopes, in consequence of his reduced prices to merit a still greater share of the patronage of those who wish to encourage home manufacture, and labour rather than compete with their mechanics to leave this city and their families and seek employment elsewhere in consequence of the Eastern work brought here by our merchants whose only object and aim seems to be to enrich themselves regardless of the sufferings of their own citizens, instead of bringing leather and having it manufactured at home.

His work will be made out of the best materials and workmanship not excelled by any in the city, at the following prices:

MEN'S WORK.
Fine Boots, from 85 to 5,50
Kip do 4,00

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

THESE celebrated Lozenges are now offered to the citizens of Nauvoo and the West, as the best preparation (for the cure of the various diseases for which they are recommended) ever offered to the public. The proprietor, Dr. Sherman, is a regular graduate of Medicine, a member of the Medical Society of the city and county of New York, and these Lozenges are prepared from medical prescriptions which have been approved by the most celebrated physicians in that city; in addition to which they are prepared in so pleasant a manner that children eat them with avidity and cry for more. They consist of

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

CAMPBELL LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The ber. Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.
This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents), brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

TO THE LATTER-DAY SAINTS.

By Miss E. R. Snow.

The trials of the present day

Require the saints to watch and pray,

That they may keep the narrow way

To the celestial glory.

For even saints may turn aside,

For fear of that which may be hid,

Or else misled by worldly pride,

And lose the celestial glory.

For rugged cliffs, mountains high,

Through smooth seas the path may lie,

Our faith, and courage, keep us true,

Or there's a sliding to the glory.

Why should we fear, for God is with us,

Our faith, and courage, keep us true,

Or there's a sliding to the glory.

For though the trials of the present day

Require the saints to watch and pray,

That they may keep the narrow way

To the celestial glory.

For even saints may turn aside,

For fear of that which may be hid,

scarce—the infernal race will be extinct in a few years—and thank God I have myself been a considerable cause of their extermination.

You must, of course, know the nature of these creatures perfectly well, said I. Do you believe in their power of fascination or charming?

The old man's countenance fell. There was a visible struggle of feeling within him; for his lip quivered, and he dashed his brown hand suddenly across his eyes, as if to conceal a tear; but quickly recovering himself, he answered in the low deep voice of one that was about to reveal some horrible secret—

I believe in the rattlesnake's power of fascination as firmly as I believe in my own existence.

Surely, said I, you do not believe that they have power over human beings?

I do—I know it to be so! and the old man trembled as he spoke. You are a stranger to me, he said slowly, after scrutinizing my features for a moment—but if you will go down with me to the foot of this rock, in the shade there—and he pointed to a group of leaping oaks that hung over the declivity—I will tell you a strange and sad story of my own experience.

It may be supposed that I readily assented to this proposal. Bestowing one more blow upon the rattlesnake, as to be certain of his death, the old man descended the rocks with a rapidity that would have endangered the neck of a less practiced hunter. After reaching the place which he pointed out, the Rattlesnake Hunter commenced his story in a manner which confirmed what I had previously heard of his education and intellectual strength.

I was among the earliest settlers in this part of the country. I had just finished my education at Harvard, when I was induced by the flattering representations of some of the earliest pioneers into the wild lands beyond the Connecticut, to seek my fortune in the new settlements. My wife, the old man's eye glistened an instant, and then a tear crossed his brown cheek, my wife accompanied me, young and delicate and beautiful as she was, to this wild and rude country. I shall never forgive myself for bringing her hither—never. Young man, continued he, you look like one that could pity. You see the image of the girl who followed me to the country. And he unbound, as he spoke, a ribbon from his neck, with a small miniature attached to it.

It was that of a beautiful female—but there was an almost childish expression in her countenance—a softness—a delicacy, and a sweetness of smile, which I have seldom seen in the features of those who have tasted, even slightly, the bitter waters of existence. The old man watched my countenance intently, as I surveyed the image of his early love. She must have been very beautiful, I said, as I returned the picture.

Beautiful he repeated, you may well say so. But this avails nothing. I have a fearful story to tell: would to God I had not attempted it; but I will go on. My heart has been stretched too often on the rack of memory to suffer any new pang.

We had resided in the new country nearly a year. Our settlements had increased rapidly, and the comforts and delicacies of life were beginning to be felt, after the weary privations and severe trials to which we had been subjected. The red men were few and feeble and did not molest us. The beasts of the forest and mountain were ferocious, but we suffered little from them. The only immediate danger to which we were exposed resulted from the rattlesnakes which infested our neighborhood. Three or four of our settlers were bitten by them, and died in terrible agonies. The Indians often told us frightful stories of the snake, and its powers of fascination, and although they were generally untrue, yet for myself, I confess, I was startled and amused then convinced by their marvelous legends.

In one of my hunting excursions abroad on a fine morning—it was just at this time of the year I was accompanied by my wife. 'Twas a beautiful morning. The sunshine was warm, but the atmosphere was perfectly clear; and a fine breeze from the north west shook the bright green leaves which clothed the profusion of the wreathing branches above us. I had left my companion for a short time in pursuit of game; and in climbing a rugged ledge of rocks, interspersed with shrubs and dwarfish trees, I was startled by a quick, grating rattle. I looked forward. On the edge of a loosened rock lay a large rattlesnake, coiling himself as if for a deadly spring. He was within a few feet of me; and I paused for an instant to survey him. I know not why, but I stood still, and looked at the deadly serpent with a strange feeling of curiosity. Suddenly he unwound his coil, as if relenting from his purpose of hostility, and raising his head, fixed his bright, fiery eye directly upon my own. A chilling and indescribable sensation, totally different from any thing I had ever before experienced followed this movement of the serpent; but I stood still, and gazed steadily and earnestly, for at that moment there was a visible change in the reptile. His form seemed to grow larger, and his colors brighter. His body moved with a slow and almost imperceptible motion toward me, and a hum of music came from him—or at least it sounded in my ear—a strange, sweet melody, faint as that which melts from the throat of a humming-bird. Then the tints of his body deepened and changed and glowed like the changes of a beautiful kaledioscope—green, purple and gold, until I lost sight of the serpent entirely and saw only wild and curiously woven circles of strange colors quivering around me, like an atmosphere of rainbows. I seemed in the centre of a great prism—a world of mysterious colors—and tints varied and darkened and lighted up again around me; and the low music went on without ceasing until my brain reeled; and fear, for the first time, came like a shadow over me. The new sensation gained upon me rapidly, and I could feel the cold sweat gushing from my brow. I had no certainty of danger in my mind—no definite ideas of peril—all was vague and clouded, like the unaccountable terrors of a dream—and yet my limbs shook, and I could feel the blood stifling with cold as it passed along my veins. I would have given worlds to have been able to tear myself from the spot—I even attempted to do so, but the body obeyed not the impulse of the mind—not a muscle stirred; and I stood still, as if my feet had grown to the solid rock, with the infernal music of the tempest in my ear, and the baleful colorings of enchantment before me.

Suddenly a new sound came upon my ear—it was a human voice—but it seemed strange and awful. Again—again—but I stirred not; and then a white form, plunged before me, and grasped my arm. The horrible spell was at once broken. The strange colors passed from before my vision. The rattlesnake was coiled at my feet, with glowing eyes and uplifted fangs; and my wife was clinging with terror upon me. The next instant the serpent threw himself upon us. My wife was the victim! The fatal fangs pierced deeply in her hand; and her scream of agony, as she staggered backward from me, told me the dreadful truth.

Then it was that a feeling of madness came upon me; and when I saw the foul serpent stealing away from his work, reckless of danger, I sprang forward and crushed him under my feet, grinding him upon the rugged rock. The groans of my wife now recalled me to her side, and to the horrible reality of her situation. There was a dark, livid spot on her hand; and it deepened into blackness as I led her away. We were a considerable distance from any dwelling; and after wandering for a short time, the pain in her wound became insupportable to my wife, and she swooned away in my arms. Weak and exhausted as I was I yet had strength enough to carry her to the nearest rivulet, and bathe her brow in the cool water. She partly recovered, and sat down upon the bank, while I supported her head upon my bosom. Hour after hour passed away and none came near us—and there—alone in the great wilderness I watched over her, and prayed with her—and she died!

The old man groaned inaudibly as he uttered these words, and as he clasped his long, bony hands over his eyes, I could see the tears falling thickly through his gaunt fingers. After a momentary struggle with his feelings, he lifted his head once more and there was a fierce light in his eye as he spoke:

But I have had my revenge. From that very moment I have felt myself fitted and set apart, by the terrible oracle of affliction, to rid the place of my abode of its foulest curse. And I have well nigh succeeded. The fascinating demons are already few and powerless. Do not somewhat equivocal expression of his countenance, that I consider these creatures as serpents only—creeping serpents; they are serpents of the fallen angel—the immediate ministers of the infernal gulf.

Years have passed since my interview with the Rattlesnake Hunter; the place of his abode has changed—a beautiful village rises near the spot of our conference, and the grass of the church-yard is green over the grave of the old hunter. But his story is fixed in my mind, and time like enamel, only burns deeper the first impression. It comes up before me like a vividly remembered dream, whose features are too horrible for reality.

PROGRESS OF ETHNOLOGY.

(Continued.) Some additional information regarding the ethnology of the Arctic regions of America has been added to our previous stock, by Messrs Dease and Simpson, in their late exploration of the northern shores of this continent. It will be recollected that Captains Beechey and Franklin had not been able to write their discoveries and complete the survey of the shores of the Arctic Sea. The Hudson Bay Company, during the years 1836—1839, undertook it, and were successful in accomplishing the task. In addition to the geographical information collected by them, we find the following views, in their journal, of the native races of North America:

The Esquimaux inhabiting all the Arctic shores of America have doubtless originally spread from Greenland, which was peopled from Northern Europe; but their neighbors, the Loucheux of Mackenzie's river, have a clear tradition that their ancestors migrated from the westward, and crossed an arm of the sea. The language of the latter is entirely different from that of the other known tribes who possess the vast region of the northward—a line drawn from Churchill, or Hudson's Bay, across the Rocky Mountains to New Caledonia. These comprehending the Chipewyans, the Copper Indians, the Beaver Indians of Peace river, the Dog Ribs, and Hare Indians of Mackenzie's river, and Great Bear Lake, with other tribes of the mountains, all speak dialects of the same original tongue. Next to them succeed the Crees speaking another distinct language and occupying another great section of the continent, extending from the lesser Slave Lake, through the woody country on the north of the Saskatchewan river, by Lake Winnipeg to York Factory, and from thence round the shores of Hudson's Bay. South of the 50th parallel, the circles of affinity contract. The Loucheux differ from every other tribe of Red Indians, by their bold, open, and perfectly frank demeanor. They are as free as savages can be from treacherous cunning and dissimulation, and have never yet shed the blood of white men. The Esquimaux seen by our author are not the stunted race hitherto described. Among those met with on the circumpolar shores, there were many robust men six feet high. He considers the Esquimaux as much superior to the Indian in intelligence, provident habits, and mechanical skill.

Some interesting facts relating to the Foulahs or Fellatahs, a nation which occupies one-tenth of the immense continent of Africa, have just been made known by Mr. Hodgson, recently the American Consul at Hougoula, and who has distinguished himself by his researches into the language and history of the

The Foulahs extend from the Atlantic Ocean, from the mouth of the Senegal and Sanegambia on the west, to the kingdoms of Bornou and Mandara on the east; from the Desert of Sahara on the north, to the mountains of Guinea on the south, thus occupying a region of more than 700,000 square miles in extent. This nation, although known under several names, was, by linguistic analogies, discovered by Adung, found to be one people. The various travellers in Central Africa have spoken of this race, and unite in opinion respecting them. The Foulahs, says Mr. Hodgson, are not negroes. They differ from the negro race in all the characteristics which are marked by physical anthropology. They may be said to occupy the intermediate space between the Arab and the Negro. All travellers concur in representing them as a distinct race, in moral as in physical traits. To their color, the various terms of bronze, copper, reddish, and sometimes white, has been applied. They are a warlike race of shepherds, and within this century, have established a political organization. They consider themselves superior to the negroes, and always rank themselves with the white. They are rigid Mohammedans, and are animated by a strong zeal for proselytism. Acting as the missionaries of Islam, they force the adoption of the Koran by the sword, when gentler means will not succeed. Mr. Hodgson is of opinion that, as the Foulahs are exercising a powerful influence upon the negroes, they are destined to be the great instrument in the future civilization of Africa, and the consequent suppression of the slave trade. The authors of the Journal of the Niger Expedition in 1841. Messrs. Schon and Crowther, are of the same opinion. They said that if the abolition party would gain over the Fellatahs it would be desirable, as thereby the axe would be laid at the root of the trade. Sir T. Fowell Buxton also, in his 'Remedy for the African Slave Trade,' appreciates the great importance of this people, in accomplishing so desirable a work.

We could extend this subject much further by speaking of nations and tribes in other parts of the globe, but our time will not permit. When the several expeditions to which we have alluded will have returned, a vast store of information may be expected.

To promote the advancement of Ethnological Science, societies have been formed in Paris, London, and New York. In this city a society has been in existence a year. It holds semi-monthly meetings, at which original papers are read, and subjects brought forward for discussion. During the coming winter they expect to publish the first volume of their transactions. Those in London and Paris are of recent formation, and have not yet issued a volume of transactions. They embrace a large number of learned men, and it is to be hoped that such an union may be the means of collecting together much that is valuable and important relating to the history of man.

On motion of Gen. Wetmore, the thanks of the society were presented to Mr. Bartlett for his interesting and learned communication, and a copy was requested for publication.

Mr. Gallatin made some remarks in reference to the subject of Ethnography, and the forthcoming work of the Foulahs, of Wm. B. Hodgson, Esq., of whose labors and great accomplishments as a linguist he spoke in terms of high eulogium. The society then adjourned.

FLYING VISITS ABROAD.

THE CITY OF MOSCOW—THE RUSSIAN CAMPAIGN, &c.

Moscow, July, 1843.

Welcome to Moscow. A few hours upon a clean bed and Russian feathers have made me forget the terrible toils of an uninterrupted travel over spring roads for four nights and three days. My bones ache and my eyes smart, it is true, but a journey ended, though ended to be so soon begun again makes pain a pleasure. During my sleepless nights in common with my fellow travellers I half repented of the resolution which made me leave an easy and beaten track for one which during our journey has seemed but half to repay our trouble. But once in Moscow, few travellers will regret the embarrassments of getting here, whether they be of the pockets or the head, provided always that the former never present a beggarly account of empty boxes, and the latter be safely poised upon your body. What are weary limbs compared with the city of the Czar, and who to see the wonders here would not endure the red eyes and aching head of the longest journey. It needed not Napoleon's ill-fated visit to invest the city with an abiding interest, but it wanted only an event like that to make Moscow familiar to all lands and interesting to every people. I sit down to write fresh from a ride to the distant hill which they are called—the heights from whence the French army, after a weary pilgrimage through the plains of Lithuania, first discovered, and in the fulness of their hearts cried aloud, 'Moscow! Moscow!' High were the hopes and bright the anticipations of that hour. A desolate waste lay behind, and a long pilgrimage had been performed from the frontiers to the heart of the Empire. The heart of the soldier had not been made glad as he had moved on from Poland to the centre of the Empire they were seeking, and if Nature, always so bountiful and so beautiful, had given promise of a glorious summer, it was but the prelude to a winter of sorrow, suffering and death. What must have been the sensations of Napoleon, as against the advice of some of his generals he left the heart and borders of Poland, and he had so much wronged, containing a brave and a noble people, men whose hopes deferred from broken promises had made the whole head sick and the whole heart faint! What must have been his bright anticipations during the sunny June that found him upon his march surrounded by his faithful soldiers, and above all by that veteran Guard who were never weary of serving the man they adored. How little dreamed Napoleon then of the dark and hidden future, and still less could the prophetic spirit of truth have whispered in his ears the stern realities that awaited him when from the hills where I just now was, he saw the possession of a vast and proud city. From the hills to the Kremlin, one would like to know what were the feelings of this man of majesty and power, and above all the workings of his mind as he stood upon the high balcony of the most holy place of the holy city, surveying with folded arms and eager eyes the mighty host whose perils and sacrifices had made him a conqueror in almost all lands. If Alexander wept because he had no more worlds to conquer, Napoleon, amidst his countless legions, just then if of the same spirit might have shed a tear, too, that seemingly his work as conqueror was so nearly finished. The French flag waved above him and around him. His splendid staff and veteran guard were at his feet, and in the distance he saw defiling before him upon the brow of the hills that skirt the city, confiding soldiers who shared alike in his honors and in his reverses as they came. There was the music of war and triumph pealing in his ears in welcome tones. The sound of revelry was heard in every breath, and if the cars were not full enough to drown the heart as it were with joy, there were seen all around waving banners and hard brows rendering homage to the one great man and mind who had been the lord of the ascendant. Here stood Napoleon in the full meridian of his glory, receiving the homage of his devoted worshippers.

The invincible Emperor was now the great deity of the Kremlin. The Shrine and Priest were embodied in the person of the warrior; and if this holy place had become desecrated in the presence of Napoleon in the eyes of the Russian worshippers at the Shrine, it became sanctified with all who followed the fortunes of the master mind of the age. As the sun appears most beautiful at its setting, so the fame of Napoleon, for just the one twilight of a day's existence, seemed to be at the very acme of its grandeur. He stood where no armed foe stood before, and from almost the highest point of all his greatness, he 'fell like a bright exhalation of the evening.' Here was the beginning of the end, and a new destiny awaited Napoleon. Moscow is in flames, and the rear and yellow leaf of autumn is upon the ground. This is Russia! cold, barren desolate Russia, and not the fine clad hills and plains of beautiful France.

Here is famine staring an army in the face, and there a scattered foe uniting to avenge a burnt and plundered city. Here was a city seen to be famished, and there the merciless Cossacks, whose lances were now drinking the blood of the spoilers, barring every distant avenue of relief and approach. Moscow is a burnt and a besieged city. There were no convoys for the French, and hunger, like a destroying worm, was creeping into the French camp. Foraging parties went forth to remain forever, more frequently, than return, for they had fallen victims to the fury of the Russian campaign. The history of the Russian campaign is too familiar and too recent to be told again, but here as I am, amidst the very scene of all these disasters, I cannot but remember such things were. The sympathy which most men have for misfortune and the admiration which every man has for the genius of Napoleon prompts one rather to leave Napoleon where he is, at the Kremlin, surrounded by his brave friends and soldiers; rather than to return with him to Paris, the fugitive of his foes and enemy who hunted like the deer of the forest. Would that a veil could be thrown over that whole disaster—a disaster to all mankind, when the earth of a whole city is made to drink up the blood of a part of the human family like water, and when those who escape the soldier's fate find a worse one in those piercing mercy. It has been most sickening to read the disasters of the soldiers of Napoleon, but to hear upon the spot from those who were actors in the scene, or those who saw the march of triumph to decay and the hasty flight of tomorrow, a recital of the yet untold realities of 1813 in Moscow is enough to make the blood cold and the heart faint. The burning of Moscow was not one of those simple facts that the imagination of man sometimes blots forth into extravagant fiction. The canvas has but traced the reality though in those strong and vivid colors which beget an impression which clings to you until you see the scene of the conflagration. The impression of a picture then becomes so deep and abiding that time will hardly efface it from the memory.

The scene is described as appalling beyond description. The table of plenty and the couch of ease, was suddenly converted into the cold autumnal heath. The deep sighing of the winds was changed for the choicest evening melody of voices attuned to gladness, and heard in voices vocal with a social and domestic love, gave place to the sobs of those who in a day had become homeless and homeless. The bright and burning flames served but to light up the pathway of many to the grave. The shouts of a victorious army were borne upon the breeze, and the eyes of the fugitives could not see their homes in flames appeared behind. The hearts of the people were literally drunk with sorrow and despair, and the more so, when they saw not only their ancient capital in the hands of a dreadful foe, but their holiest shrines converted into the camp of the leader of the host. There were some who remained amidst the smoking ruins of their habitations and near their altars; choosing rather to seek death in the bosom of their despoiled churches and homes, than to escape it at the sacrificial cost. The Kremlin remained, protected by its high walls and unscathed by the flames, and while there was the desolate city, there was the victory; not, believe, the author of the calamity, as many of the Russians would have you believe, but lamenting these sad fruits of a victory thus avenged. At this late day there is a grave discussion here as to the real authors of the catastrophe. Some of the Russians charge it upon the French; as if Napoleon would have given over to the devouring element, the only place where he could have hoped for shelter and protection during the winter so near at hand. It was not Napoleon but the Russians who fired the city; stoutly as many in and out of Russia deny that their countrymen were the destroyers. When the French were at the gates of the city, the prison doors were opened and the prisoners set free. The worst criminals and all the refuse of society were turned loose to spoil and destroy what they would. It might have been those of the wild Polacks that applied the torch, or it might have been the Russian Count Rostopchin, as one sufficient in command to enforce obedience to any order. The foreign residents here almost universally attribute the act to him. It was the burning of Moscow more than any feeling of revenge, that gave a sort of savage ferocity to every movement of the French army. They had slain until the hand of the murderer was faint with labor, and even the thirstiest spirit of vengeance became exhausted. Napoleon alone had power to check the prevailing madness of the hour, and before him all were awed into silence and respect. With the destroyers themselves it was soon blood for blood. The desolation became desolate, and the destroyer of another's life, a suppliant for his own. The temples had been robbed of their gold, and silver, and precious stones, and such was the plunder of the French Emperor sent from Moscow to Paris; a part of which reached its destination, but most of it was intercepted by the Cossacks, who seemed to be omnipresent, and dealing out vengeance wherever they appeared. A full indeed must have been every incident of the Russian campaign, from the entrance of the French army into the city in the splendor of a great triumph, to their sad departure from the walls of the town, driven forth as they were almost like the prisoners weekly borne from the hill I have just visited, to dreary and distant Siberia. The fire broke forth in the Kremlin, where there was contagion in every inch of ground, and from this centre it spread until nearly four fourths of the city were in flames. The walls of the Kremlin were impregnable to the flames, but the city was burnt and burning beyond; the flames being spread even by the incendiary and robber, until orders were given to hang every Russian at his door, who should be found thus sacrificing life and property. For a time Moscow was a sea of fire, and it rolled on, driven by the winds, and overwhelming every thing that stood in its course. The temple, the palace and the cottage all alike fell before and beneath the fury of the flames. The waters of the Moskva that wound their serpentine course along the city, nor those of the lake and springs around, nor all the labor and art of man, could stay the march of the angel of death. He moved on with the flaming sword, and whithersoever he would, he went, until even the destroyer seemed weary of his flight, and of his own will stayed his own progress. Look on that city, and now on this. From the Sharroff hills I see no signs of this desolation. Every thing is bright and beautiful beneath you. Just at the base of fire there is the sun of heaven gilding the domes and minarets of the Kremlin. Hundreds of churches and convents are seen, and the great river of the city is at the foot of the hill from whence begins the expanded plain upon which the city has been laid. The Boulevard of the town give some form and shape to the irregular mass within; but beyond the walls, there is neither form nor shape. All is confusion; but the confusion of buildings, crowned as they are with so many towers, domes and minarets, with the pointed roofs of almost all the dwellings, make the whole view picturesque and imposing. The city is seen from the Sharroff hills in all its extent and grandeur.

The setting sun shone fully upon the Kremlin as I stood upon the brow of the hill, and at a glance all the buildings of the sacred enclosure of those beyond were seen, appearing in more than their own beauty. We had travelled six or seven versts from the town to see these hills, with do other attraction than the grand view they gave of the city. As in all historical places, there were here most interesting associations to add to the pleasure of our visit. They were not only those I have mentioned in the first appearance of Moscow to the French army, after their long and weary march from Poland, but here, almost upon the summit of the hill, is the temporary prison house of the unfortunate beings, doomed to an eternal exile in the mines and amidst the wilds of Siberia. Fresh from the knot and recent from the chains, they are borne first to this great depot prepared for their reception, and from thence to their new dreary home. The Sabbath is the day selected for this pilgrimage, and of a Sabbath morning, or noon, may be seen from fifty to three fifty human beings borne off, under a strong military guard, to regions where they are to remain till death relieves them from their sufferings. There is no return from this exile, and the mention of Siberia in Russia seems to excite terror in every bosom that hears the sound. The political offender and the offender against the laws of God and man find here a common resting place. It is treason to think aloud, either in the whisper of a thought or through the Press. The laws is deemed more potent than the sword, and Siberia is hung up like a ghost, or goblin, damned, to terrify all who speak, and write, as well as those who act with freedom against the State. Upon the Sharroff hills is the depot for most of these offenders, and here congregate the curious and the sympathizing to see their fellow men thus torn from friends and country to the commission of offences some times never designed as such, and in other lands would be deemed more a virtue than a crime. Moscow is only the depot for the prisoners of the Capital and those of the Provinces north and west. Further at the east there is another depot for collecting and engaging the prisoners of state. I saw some of the most miserable of these beings upon the hill, before I took leave, closely watched by the soldiers, compelled to labor under the eyes of a strong body guard, and looking as if hope had fled from them forever. I would have seen the exit of the Sabbath day prisoners, but so poor a curiosity it seemed to be as well to leave ungratified, after the specimens of misery I had seen. A traveller is so closely watched in Russia, and the catalogue of offences are so many, that even the neighborhood of a depot like that I have just seen, and the associations connected with it, and sufficient to make a man almost involuntarily put his hand to his head to see if it fairly rests upon his shoulders. There may be no danger for a foreigner; but the heart and heart strings, too, if there be such machinery, I should think would crack every time a Russian passes the Sharroff hills.

From the New Haven Palladium. THE NOVEMBER METEORS SATISFACTORILY EXPLAINED BY PROFESSOR OLMSTEAD.

The following is an article prepared for us, at our request, by Professor OLMSTEAD.

Messrs Editors: After a careful consideration of all the facts connected with the great meteoric shower of November 13th, 1833; I was led to the following conclusions:

1. That the meteors did not originate in the atmosphere, but came from the regions of space. Of this there were various proofs; but it is sufficient to mention that the velocity of the meteors was greater than it is possible for any body to acquire in falling through the atmosphere.

2. That they consisted of exceedingly light combustible matter. It was light, because, notwithstanding their immense velocity, (not less than eighteen miles per second,) they were stopped by the resistance of the air at a considerable height above the earth; and it was combustible, because we saw them burn.

3. They were portions of a large, nebulous or cometary body. The body must have been large to supply such a vast number of meteors, some of them having a volume not less than several hundred feet in diameter; it must have been of a nebulous or cometary nature, as was indicated by the form of the matter itself; and portions only came down to us, since the body remained to afford successive showers.

4. That the meteoric body had a revolution around the sun nearly commensurate with that of the earth. It must have had a revolution around the sun, since, on account of the sun's attraction, no body could remain stationary for a year at a certain point of the earth's orbit, as must have otherwise been the case with this body, in order to have met the earth, as it was found to have done, at the same time in November, in the years 1830, 1831, and 1832; and its rate with that of the earth, being either a year, or some aliquot part of a year, so to go round the sun either once or twice, or some even number of times, while the earth goes round once, otherwise the earth could not have fallen in with it for several successive years at the same point in its orbit. It was further evident that the earth passed through or near such a body at the time of the meteoric shower, because the part of the heavens from which the meteors came was precisely that towards which the earth was at that time going, namely the constellation Leo.

5. If the period of the meteoric body were exactly commensurate with that of the earth, then (aside from accidental disturbances of its motion by the attraction of the planets,) we might expect a recurrence of the phenomenon every 13th of November; but if, as was probable, the two periods were only nearly, and not exactly, commensurate, then the two bodies would be near each other for several years, but finally get so far asunder that no more meteors would be attracted to the earth, and a very long time might elapse before the bodies came together again. In this respect the rotations of the two bodies would resemble those of the sun and Venus. When these bodies once meet at the node of the planet, Venus makes a transit across the sun's disk; and since eight revolutions of the sun are nearly commensurate with seven revolutions of Venus, they are borne first to this great depot prepared for their reception, and from thence to their new dreary home. The Sabbath is the day selected for this pilgrimage, and of a Sabbath morning, or noon, may be seen from fifty to three fifty human beings borne off, under a strong military guard, to regions where they are to remain till death relieves them from their sufferings. There is no return from this exile, and the mention of Siberia in Russia seems to excite terror in every bosom that hears the sound. The political offender and the offender against the laws of God and man find here a common resting place. It is treason to think aloud, either in the whisper of a thought or through the Press. The laws is deemed more potent than the sword, and Siberia is hung up like a ghost, or goblin, damned, to terrify all who speak, and write, as well as those who act with freedom against the State. Upon the Sharroff hills is the depot for most of these offenders, and here congregate the curious and the sympathizing to see their fellow men thus torn from friends and country to the commission of offences some times never designed as such, and in other lands would be deemed more a virtue than a crime. Moscow is only the depot for the prisoners of the Capital and those of the Provinces north and west. Further at the east there is another depot for collecting and engaging the prisoners of state. I saw some of the

These, and similar considerations, led to the belief that the meteoric shower of November, would recur a few times, in a manner less and less striking, until it ceased altogether and would not return until after a cycle of years; to be determined by a long course of observations. Accordingly, the November meteors made their appearance every year until 1839, since which time they have exhibited nothing remarkable. It appears, therefore, superfluous to call on the public to be upon the look-out at the return of the anniversary, although astronomers may deem it advisable to do so, in order at least, to ascertain the non-appearance of the meteors. Observations this morning under favorable circumstances, indicated non-appearance of a meteoric shower.

Poor Man of Mutton.—The blade bone of a shoulder of mutton is called in Scotland a poor man as in some parts of England it is termed a poor knight of Windsor—in contrast it must be presumed, to the baronial Sir Loin. It is said that, in the last age, an old Scottish Peer, whose conditions (none of the most gentle) were marked by a strange and fierce-looking expression of the Highland countenance, chanced to be indisposed, whilst attending Parliament. The master of the Hotel where he lodged, anxious to show attention to his noble guest, waited on him, to enumerate the contents of his well stocked larder, so as to endeavor to hit on something which might suite his appetite. I think I could eat a morsel of a poor man; the landlord fled in terror, having no doubt that his guest was a cannibal, who might be in the habit of eating a slice of a tenant, as light food, when he was under a regiment.

From the Ottawa Free Trader. THE SANGAMO JOURNAL AND THE CANAL LOAN.

The last Sangamo Journal in speaking of the canal loan, has the following:

The matter is beset with difficulties. As we understood the subject, the facts are these.—The bondholders have agreed to advance $100,000 dollars on condition that the agent verify the statements of the canal commissioners. The agent is Governor Davies, of Massachusetts; who by this time is probably making examinations preparatory to a decision on that point. If the decision is favorable, trustees will be appointed and the money advanced, on condition that all the canal property shall be put into the hands of the trustees, to secure this advance.—If the legislature in the winter 1844—45 shall refuse to tax the people, or refuse to make appropriations from the resources of the state (money to be derived from the sale of public lands is probably regarded as resources,) no farther advances will be made, and the canal lands will then be sold by the trustees, or otherwise disposed of as they shall think best, to remunerate the bondholders for their advance of $100,000.

This extract shows that the editor of the Journal has either committed a wilful falsehood, or that he does not understand what he is talking about. It is not true that, if the next legislature refuse to tax the people, &c., no further advances will be made, and the canal lands will be sold by the trustees, or otherwise disposed of as they shall think best, to remunerate the bondholders for their advance of $100,000. The bondholders ask the governor to enter into a contract for securing the payment of their advances in manner pointed out in said act of the legislature of Illinois, (the canal act,) act (sec. 13) that none of the lands, lots, or water powers so granted to the said trustees shall be sold until three months after the completion of the said canal. The bondholders by the proposed contract will therefore merely obtain a lien on the canal property to the amount of their advance, but the lien cannot be discharged before the canal is completed. Nor, after the canal is completed, can the trustees in whom the property is now to be vested sell it, to remunerate the bondholders for their present advance of $100,000; without, at the same time, also remunerating all others who may have made advances to complete the canal. The bondholders obtain no preference—the sum they agreed to advance is to rank pari passu with any other sums to be contributed towards the completion of the canal, and no more. In short, the bondholders ask no other security for their present advance than is given them in the canal law, and that is little more than what they have on the whole canal debt, to wit, a lien on the canal property.

Thus is easily disposed of the first difficulty the astonishing acumen of the editor of the Journal has enabled him to discover in the arrangement for the completing of the canal. But gross and palpable as is his blunder (to use no harsher term,) now that he has been set right, will the Journal have the candor to place this matter in its proper light before its readers? We venture to say no. The object of the Journal is to render the arrangement to give money to the south, by means of such statements as the above, no matter if false, it expects to do this, for it knows that but few papers friendly to the canal, and that will take the trouble to contradict such statements, circulate in the south. False statements therefore answer its purpose as well as true ones would. But there is one important consideration the whig papers of the south lose sight of in their incessant opposition to the canal. While they fondly imagine they are daily rendering our democratic rulers more unpopular, their course is increasing their popularity in more than a two-fold ratio here in the north. The whig editors in the south have no idea how earnestly the whigs here depreciate their unreasonable opposition to the canal. It is breaking their party down more rapidly than any scheme the bitterest opponents of the whigs could invent. We copy in another column an article from the Rushville Whig, from which the Sangamo Journal and Alton Telegraph, may learn to some extent, in what light their course is regarded by their whig brethren in the north; but we can assure those papers that the language of the Whig is very mild indeed compared to what we daily hear in reference to their course from whigs in this neighborhood.

Navy of Great Britain.—We notice that the expenses of the navy of England, for the year ending the 5th of July, 1843, are charged at 10,557,301.142 sterling, which in round numbers falls but little short of 100,000,000. The navy consists of 163 ships of the line, 117 frigates, 64 war steamers, and 824 smaller vessels, employing 27,000 seamen and 25,000 marines.

The Navy of France, 1843, is said at 46 ships of the line, 56 first class frigates, 23 steam frigates, (all of the above named are nearly new,) 330 sloops of war and smaller vessels, and 25,000 seamen, who also perform duty as marines on board; France having no marine corps attached to the navy.

According to the letters from Ancona, a volcano appeared last month in the rocky island of Melada, situated on the Adriatic, near Ragusa. On the night of the 15th, eruptions from seven distinct craters were observed.

The New Bedford Mercury has a file of Honolulu Advocate to Aug. 6, containing the melancholy particulars of the loss of the white ship Parker, of New Bedford, on Ocean Island, a ledge of rocks in the Pacific.

The crew were unable to save sufficient clothes to cover them, or any provisions except one peck of beans and 15 or 20 pounds of salt meat, picked up after the vessel went to pieces. No water was saved. Before the vessel was deserted her masts were cut away, upon which and some floating spars, 22 of the ship company succeeded in crossing the reef. Immediately after the vessel struck, the mate and two men lowered a boat which was stove against the vessel. On the boat's wreck, however they were drifted by the current about 3 miles to the south, when, meeting a counter current, they were carried near the reef, but only one of the men was able to join his companions, who had constructed a raft from the wreck. Sad indeed was the prospect to those struggling for their lives and clinging to the raft, who four of their shipmates had found a watery grave.

After 8 days and 7 nights of incessant labor and intense suffering from hunger and thirst, they succeeded in reaching the island, where they found some remains of the wrecked English whaler Gledstanes, which served for firewood and building materials. One solitary dog was the only representative of civilized life, which had been left by the crew of the Gledstanes. His flesh afforded some variety to a constant diet upon sea-fowl and seals. From the old wreck of the Parker they obtained some pieces of copper, which were manufactured into cooking utensils. They sent off 120 sea-fowls, with tailed pieces of wood attached to them, hoping some one would be caught, which would in hieroglyphic language, denote the location of the wreck of the Parker. Thus month after month passed away. Sabbath, which usually consisted of prayer and reading of the Scriptures, with such sacred hymns as the memories of the worshippers could recall.

After more than six months had thus been spent, a vessel which proved to be the James Stewart, St. John N. B., reached the Island April 17. Twenty were left upon the island, who were generously supplied with 20 lbs. of bread and 20 lbs. beef each, besides one barrel of salt, and cotton cloth sufficient for each one a shirt, and numerous minor articles of essential benefit. The Capt. of the James Stewart pledged his word that at the end of the cruise he would return for them. On the 21st of May a second sail was discovered, which proved to be the whaleship Nassau, N. Bedford, Capt. Weeks. On learning their situation, he immediately ordered his boats ashore to bring off every person. He supplied them with clothing and provisions in abundance. Every accommodation which the Nassau could afford was placed at their disposal. Seven of the number have enlisted on board the Nassau to perform the voyage, while the remaining thirteen were landed at this port, under the protection of the American consulate.

Small Change.—Any one travelling along the seaboard of North Carolina, will notice the immense quantity of dried herrings used by the inhabitants. They appear to constitute the staple of life in that quarter.

A gentleman on his way to the south not long since, got out of the stage and entered a tavern for the purpose of refreshing himself. After taking a glass of whiskey and treating the driver, he threw down half a dollar. The bar-keeper looked perplexed, and said, I have no silver change, sir, but plenty of the common, if you will take it.

Here he counted out thirty seven herrings, which the traveller had to roll up in a piece of paper and take with him, thinking they might serve him for dinner. The stage went on, and at the next stopping place he hailed an old lady, and asked her if she could sell him a loaf of bread. She offered him a large loaf of fresh rye, and in return he counted out six herrings.

La me, she exclaimed; where did you get so much change? Can you change me a quarter? This he did cheerfully, and had six herrings remaining to eat.

Good.—An up-country gallant, not long since went over to see his "bright particular," and after sitting near half a day without saying a word, got up, and says he, well I reckon it's a gittin' fudden times—I must be a goin'. Wall a good evenin' to you all Miss Nancy.

Cure for Deafness.—It is said that by mixing sulphuric ether and ammonia, and allowing it to stand fourteen days a solution is formed, which if properly applied to the internal ear, will remove in almost every case, this hitherto considered incurable affection.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, DEC. 20, 1843.

Numerous reports are in circulation relative to mobs being gathering to frustrate the designs of justice, and screen some of our kidnapping gentry from the power of the law. We can tell such, however, that they will not be able to accomplish their designs, and that it would be much better for them to stay at home and mend their own business, if they wash themselves well.

We thank God that we have not got a mobocratic governor in this state, but one who will abide the laws of the land, who will magnify his office, and does not feel disposed to prostitute it to the base principles of mobocracy, nor trundle to the influence of any unholy alliances that would add to the oppression of the innocent. And we have got a patriotic band in this place, who have already been ground down to the dust of death by oppressive persecution, and mobocratic influence, who will bear it no longer; whose motto would be, if pressed to it, "We're to the knife, and knife to the hilt," in support of their own freedom, and that of the citizens of Illinois, rather than see our glorious institutions, our liberties, and our sacred rights trampled in the dust.

We would say to our friends abroad there is nothing to fear. We scarcely believe many of these reports; but if true we have nothing to fear, our legion is prepared for the worst, and we are very much mistaken if there are not thousands of patriots in the State of Illinois, who would stand up in the defence of law, and rally round the standard of liberty, whose souls are fired with the spirit of '76, and who would rather sacrifice their lives than bow to the yoke of Missouri, suffer their sacred rights to be trampled underfoot, or be governed by the dictions of the mobocratic nigger-drivers of Missouri. Great God! is it not enough that they carry out their bloody designs at home? Shall they pursue their victims to the State of Illinois, and pollute her free soil with their diabolical acts? Never!! No never!! No never!!!

KIDNAPPING.

It will be recolled that we gave an account last week of two persons being kidnapped by some persons from the state of Missouri. The names of the persons kidnapped were Daniel, and Philander Avery, father, and son. Philander, the son, by some means or other escaped from their hands, and returned to this State. We have also obtained information from other sources pertaining to this diabolical outrage, having a tendency to implicate others of whom we favorably could have hoped better things.

The following affidavit will show that some of the citizens of Illinois are so far fallen, and so much governed by mobocratic influences as to assist the Missouri wretches in their hellish designs:

STATE OF ILLINOIS.) Hancock county.

On the 11th day of December 1843, came Sisson A. Chase, before me Aaron Johnson, a justice of the peace of said county, and after being duly sworn deposed and said that the crime of kidnapping has been committed in Hancock county, and on the 24th of this present Dec., 1843, at the house of Schrench Freeman, about four miles and a half south of Warsaw, in said county; your said affiant heard a man by the name of John Eliot say that he was going a shooting turkeys, when asked what he was going to shoot them with, he showed a brace of pistols and a large hickory cane; your affiant observed that he thought he could not kill turkeys with such weapons, and the said Eliot said there was a certain cock he meant to take before night and they would do for that. He said Eliot went off, and your affiant did not see him till Sunday evening the third, when your affiant asked the said Eliot if he had caught his turkey, and he replied yes, the one he was after, a Mormon Elder; your affiant then asked him who he was and he said Daniel Avery; your affiant then asked the said Eliot what had been done with said Avery? and he said we put on to a horse, tied his legs and carried him to the river, from whence about ten o'clock at night, we took him into Clark county, Missouri, for scaling a horse three years ago, where they would try him, and if found guilty, they would then take him into another county where there was a jail, and there was none in Clark county. On the 4th day of December I asked him if he had writs or authority to take Mr. Avery, he replied, we all had writs. On the 5th day the said Eliot said he expected to get into difficulty on account of this scrape, but if any mormon makes any business with me, I will shoot him; and further your affiant says not.

SISSON A. CHASE.

Subscribed and sworn to this 11th day of December 1843, before me.

AARON JOHNSON, J. P.

Upon the filing of the foregoing affidavit a constable was immediately dispatched for the said John Eliot, who was brought forthwith to Nauvoo and had a hearing before Aaron Johnson, justice of the peace. The court was held in the large room over General Smith's store, on Monday afternoon.

The court being opened and the affidavit read, on the question being asked the prisoner, guilty or not guilty, he plead not guilty.

Sisson B. Chase sworn.
I went down to that neighborhood to go to work—found work at Mr. Schrench Freeman's. Mr. Eliot was there—entered into conversation—found them opposed to Mormonism—next morning there was something said relative to him, Mr. Eliot's going to shoot turkeys. I asked him what he would shoot them with—he fetched a pair of pistols—I said I thought he could not kill turkeys with such weapons—he said there was a certain cock they intended to take before night—he thought they would do for that—he also had a hickory cane and said, that would be a good weapon. He went away on Saturday morning and returned on Sunday night—he then said that he had taken the turkey—a Mormon Elder, Avery—that they had taken him to the river at Warsaw, and took him across the river at ten o'clock at night—that they had taken him to Clark county, Missouri—would try him there and take him to another county where there was a jail.

I said that would not do. In two days he came back—I asked what he had been doing—he said taking a Mormon Elder—I asked if they had taken him by authority—he said not, but by force of arms. He Chase, said that he should likely get into difficulty; but that if a mormon should touch him he would shoot them. He said that Joseph Smith was a bad man, that he would be taken—I said they had tried it before but had failed—he said that they would not fail this time, that a plan was in operation that would succeed—that he would be popped over.

Mr. Smith asked what was said about him—prisoners counsel objected. Mr. Smith said he had a right to hear concerning himself. Court decided that it might be heard inasmuch as other mormons were mentioned.

Mr. Sisson A. Chase again related something similar to what he had done before—related the design of Missouri to take him—they wanted Mr. Smith, and some three or four more.

Stephen Markham sworn.
Heard Mr. Eliot make no threats—heard Mr. E. say that he assisted in taking Daniel Avery—that there was nine of them engaged in it, six belonging to Illinois and three to Missouri. He was taken in this county.

Did Mr. Eliot make any threats to Avery? Not to me only in taking him. He swore he would shoot us, and pointed his pistol. I told him to stand or I would shoot him if he offered resistance—that we were officers of the peace—had a writ for him—that if he gave himself up he should be civilly treated.

Cross examined.
He was taken into it not knowing what it would amount to—he said he would assist in taking the leaders, McCoy, Clark, Williams and his son, I forget the names of the whole; there was nine in company; I think Sturgeon was one, I also think the name of one was Cox.

King Follett sworn.

Don't know that I can make any addition to the testimony—the man attempted to get away, but we headed him. He threatened to shoot at first, but afterwards gave up. He confessed to me that he had been guilty of kidnapping—he said he was led into it by others—he did not know what he was doing. He said there was Mr. Clark who was far more guilty than he, and wanted me to take them; I said I could not do it—I had no authority. He acknowledged the whole circumstance and said he would do so to the court. The prisoner was then asked if he had any plan to make, he said not at this time.

The court declared that the said John Eliot he held to bail in the sum of $3000 dollars to appear on the first day of the sitting of the county court at Carthage. Mr. Smith observed that the gentleman was a stranger, and might not be able to get bail, and suggested the propriety of the bond being reduced. The court however thought that in consequence of the enormity of the crime, that the bond was not more than sufficient to cause the prisoner to appear on the day of trial, and therefore could not mitigate it.

After the prisoner was remanded, there was another writ issued, predicated upon the following affidavit made returnable before R. D. Foster, J. P.:

STATE OF ILLINOIS.) Hancock county.

Personally appeared before me Rob't D. Foster, a justice of the peace for Hancock county, Joseph Smith, who being duly sworn according to law, deposed and said, that one John Eliot of said county is guilty of a breach of the peace for this, that on or about the second instant, the said John Eliot did use threatening language concerning your deponent as informed that said threatening language was made in the county of Hancock, and further this deponent says not.

JOSEPH SMITH.

Subscribed and sworn to this 18th of Dec. A. D. 1843.

R. D. FOSTER, J. P.

The prisoner was again brought forward and the court adjourned for one hour.

The court said that it was his privilege to plead for a change of venue by paying the costs, but as the costs were not forthcoming the court proceeded.

Mr. Styles then read the act to regulate the apprehension of offenders and for other purposes, p. 219. r. s. The act sets forth the use of threatening language is sufficient to criminate individuals; this we are prepared to prove.

Sisson Chase sworn.

The testimony was similar to that before delivered with the following additional items:

I did ask him if he had authority—in the morning he said that he would not core about shooting some of the inhumanes in conversation with him he carried the idea that a conspiracy was formed against Joseph Smith and others, and that some of them would be shot. These conversations were had at different times. He thought Mr. Smith was a bad character. He thought they ought to be taken. What Joseph Smith, and some others. I told him he had been taken, but had been acquitted. He did not thank the Governor for that. He carried the idea that there was a conspiracy against his life, and said we have a plan in operation that will put him over.

Question by court. Do you know how long Mr. Ellet has been in the county?

No.

By counsel for prisoner. Did you hear him state that he himself would do anything? I heard him state nothing further than I have mentioned.

Mr. Markham and Mr. Ellet sworn.

By the court. Is your residence Mr. Ellet in this county? Yes.

King Ellet sworn.

I have heard of the things stated but not from him.

Messrs. Marr and Styles, attorneys, resident in Nauvoo, make some thrilling remarks pertaining to the outrageous proceedings of Missouri. The diabolical conduct of those wretches who could be engaged in destroying and kidnapping their fellow men was portrayed in glowing colors. Judge Phelps and General Smith then followed on the same subject, their language was thrilling and eloquent and powerful. If ever humanity and deeds of blood were depicted in their traitors' eyes it was on that occasion; their thoughts flashed as fire and they spoke in words that burned. We never saw the character of General Smith so clearly developed for while he rebuked and depicted the fiends, he made the culprit stand charged with his true colors; he tried the poor wretch that then stood before him, and with feelings of commiseration, benevolence and philanthropy, withdrew his charge, wished it it was in the power of the court that the culprit might be forgiven, promised to pay all the charges, and invited him and those of his friends who came along, to come to his house, and they should be taken care of. It would be superfluous for us to attempt to give even a faint outline of the remarks made by the above named gentlemen; we hope to have at least a synopsis of their speeches for publication which we are sure would be highly interesting to our readers. Upon the whole, although a painful yet it was an interesting occasion and well long to be remembered, and unless Mr. Ellet's heart, and those of his friends, were made of adamant, it must have made a deep impression on their minds and affect their life in the future.

These things were in type, we have received information that Mr. John Ellet is now in the Chicago jail, where he is to be held until he can be sent to the Missouri State Prison.

It is also reported that on that the celebrated mother, Col. Williams with his party, have left for Missouri; we suppose that he has found out the pleasure of entertaining mobs.

For the Neighbor.

In compliance with your request, I will state, for the information of the readers of your excellent journal, that Mr. Rich and Braham who was so severely wounded on the night of the 10th inst. by one of the individuals who, among other things, robbed him of a small sum of money which was all he possessed, is in my opinion, entirely out of danger, and is rapidly recovering.

Kind of Pleasure.—The New York Post says it is estimated that there must have been twenty thousand persons at the various places of amusement, concerts, theaters and fairs, on Thursday night week.

At a very numerous meeting of the citizens of Nauvoo, held at the corner of Main and Water streets on the 9th Dec. 1843, Mr. Heber C. Kimball was elected chairman, and J. M. Bernhisel appointed secretary. Mr. George A. Smith having made a few observations, Mr. John Taylor read the preamble and resolutions of a meeting held at the Temple on the 7th instant, also an ordinance entitled an extra ordinance for the extra case of Joseph Smith and others, recently passed by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo; likewise the 4th and 6th articles of the amendments of the constitution of the United States; and the opinion of the Attorney General of the State of Illinois, on the subject of the organization of the Nauvoo Legion, he being of the opinion that said Legion was disconnected from the military communities of the whole State, and in no way subject to the regular military laws, possessing an exemption even from subjection to the general military laws, with a law making power vested in their own Legion.

After some pertinent remarks by Mr. Taylor, General Joseph Smith briefly addressed the meeting; he dissented entirely from the opinion of the Attorney General, and observed that it was stated in the charter that the Legion was a part of the militia of Illinois, and that his commission declared that he (General Smith) was the Lieutenant General of the Nauvoo Legion, and if the militia of the State of Illinois, and as such, it was not only his duty to enforce the city ordinances, but the laws of the State when called on by the Governor. He also stated that he had been informed that the Chief Magistrate of Missouri had in contemplation to make another requisition on the Governor of Illinois for him, Joseph Smith.

The meeting then adjourned, sine die. H. C. KIMBALL, Chairman. J. M. BERNHISEL, Sec.

London, which extends its intellectual, if not its topographical identity from Bethnal-green to Turnham green (ten miles) from Kentishtown to Brixton, (seven miles) whose houses are said to number 200,000; and to occupy twenty square miles of ground, has a population of a little less than 2,000,000 of souls, or rather mouths. Its levitation is composed of nearly 10,000 streets, lanes, alleys, squares, places, terraces, &c. It consumes upwards of 4,200,000 lbs of animal food weekly, which is washed down by 1,100,000 barrels of port annually, exclusive of other liquors. Its rental is at least 7,000,000 a year duty alone. It has 237 churches, 207 dissenting places of worship, and upwards of 5,000 public houses, and 16 theatres.

Mysterious Profession.—Now Tom, said the printer of a country newspaper, in giving directions to his apprentice, put the foreign leaders into the galley and lock 'em up; let Napoleon's remains have a larger head; distribute the army in the east; take up a line and finish the British Ministers; make the young Princess to run on with the Duchess of Kent; move the Kerry hunt out of the chase; get your stick and conclude the horrid murder which Joe began last night; wash your hands and come into dinner; and see that all the pigs are cleared up.

ANSWER TO THE ENIGMA OF LAST WEEK.

Some friend to the Neighbor, unknown to me who.

Some genius in Enigmas designs for to show; Though a mystery piece, it's left without name.

And I've the presumption to answer the same. Though I treat with the writer, it's well understood.

For it was found in that which is good. Yet in many a place it's not known to be. For it never was found in mystery.

It's not to be found in the heaven above. Nor with the Almighty, the fountain of love. It's not in the earth, nor the sea, that's so blue. In fact it's not found in any thing true.

In every word that we speak it is found. What's the whole matter? freely do I say around. It's a story to tell.

But never discerned in earth, heaven or hell. It never is heard in language sublime, And with it the poet never make a rhyme.

It's not in any language I'd have you to know, For all was composed with the small letter O.

For the Neighbor.

ANSWER TO ENIGMA EXTRAORDINARY.

In solving the question pray grant me the favor. (If these lines are found worthy a place in the Neighbor.)

To oppose the assertion of part that's been told. Of the wonderful things your enigma unfolded.

It's unlike a globe, nor is't placed in its center. It's ruled by the tongue, when the mouth it's death enter.

If it's always in fiction how'er odd it may seem. In the face of the sun, moon, or stars can't be seen.

It cannot be found in earth, heaven, or hell. In fire, air, or water, it never can dwell. It cannot be found whenever the soil.

In no state or empire, on this earthly ball. To search the vast deep, what's the labor it's all. It cannot be found in lake, river, or sea. Not a sound on the shore will its presence convey.

Our eyes which wealth it never can be seen. To the right, it's partial, in pocket and store. It does not begin with the town of Babylon.

With the general or captain it never was killed. To be brief is my object I'll tell you at once. It cannot be found with the river of Jordan.

In each season and month it does plainly appear. And is seen every morning throughout the whole year.

This enigma explained to the high and the low. Will show the small letter by the school-boy called O.

For the Neighbor.

MORNING.

BY JOHN C. PRINGLE.

'Tis morn, but the full and cloudless moon. Pours from her starry urn a cloudless light.

'Tis but a little space beyond the noon.—The still, delicious noon of Summer's night; Forth from my home I take an early flight.

Down the lone dale pursue my devious way; Bound o'er the meadows with a keen delight. Brush from the forest leaves the dewy spray, And scale the lone steep to watch the kindling day.

The lark is up, the daffodil of the arch. Exulting in his airy realm on high, His song, profuse in melody and air.

Makes vocal all the region of the sky. The startled moor cock, with a sudden cry, Springs from beneath my feet, and I pass.

The sheep regard me with an earnest eye, Ceasing to nibble at the scanty grass.

And scour the barren waste in one tumultuous mass.

But lo! the stars are waning, and the dawn. Blushes and burns adwain the east—behold! The early sun, behind the upland lawn.

Looks o'er the summit with a front of gold: Back from his beaming brow the mists are rolled. And as he climbs the crystal tower of morn.

Rocks, woods and glens, their shadows depths unfold; The trembling dew grows brighter on the thorn.

And Nature smiles as fresh as if but newly born. God of the boundless Universe! I come To hold communion with myself and Thee!

And though excess of beauty makes me dumb, My thoughts are eloquent with all I see; My foot is on the mountain—I am free.

And buoyant as the winds that round me blow! My dreams are sunny as you pleasant lies, And tranquil as the pool that sleeps below.

White, circling round my heart, a Poet's raptures glow.

SERMON ON THE MOUNT.

He sat upon the mount—around him crowd. Listening thousands—the mother and the child. The rich, the poor, the lowly and the proud—

To catch the words which flow in accents mild. From lips unstained, pure and undecified. But mixed with one dwell on every face—

Tale of ocean; the scroll of bitter hate, Some meek and lowly, lowly his winning grace. And his each word, the holy Saviour spake, And fit for him, the world they could forsake.

How lovely is Religion, when it flows. Fresh from the fountain of an undimmed art; Lifts his triumphs—but it never knows The deep, true joy, which silently doth start.

In the mind's temple, holy and apart. The Saviour spake for all—for all he died— The sinner and the saint—in all time.

Shall his humbleness rebuke man's pride, And raise the stricken one of every clime, To worship truth, eternal and sublime.

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

The two years there—around that humble board They sat in silence, at the close of day. When from his lips there came the startling word:

One of you shall most surely me betray. What is it, Lord? they sadly ask'd, Oh! say? One scowling brow is reddened new with shame.

There's a sinner glowing in a wild dark eye— On history page in blood is writ that name. In lines of infamy that never can die, Stands Judas—the false disciple—living lie.

He spake again in accents soft and mild: Command I ye, that each his passions smother. So that of men, ye may be truly say'd My dear disciples, and a true brother.

To all, loving and soothing one another. To all, loving and soothing one another. To all, loving and soothing one another.

Where goes that, Lord? then Simon Peter said: Whither I go thou can'st not follow now? Nay! for thy sake, Lord, shall my blood be shed.

Thou wilt deny me, ere the cock doth crow. Alas! many weakners—it was even so.

An Ordinance regulating Merchants and Grocers Licenses.

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the City of Nauvoo, that before any person or persons can legally sell or vend goods, wares, provisions or commodities, as merchants or grocers at any stand, store, or grocery, within the limits of said city, he, she, or they shall first obtain a license from the City Recorder, for which he, she, or they shall pay down at the rate of one dollar in trade, at the discretion of said Recorder by inquiring upon oath, as to the amount of stock; and said license shall continue in force one year from the date: The amount for said license shall be by the Recorder paid into the treasury for the use and benefit of said city.

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained that this ordinance shall go into effect on the 25th day of December, instant, and that the penalty for refusal or neglect to comply with its requirements, shall be two dollars upon every hundred dollars worth of stock in trade, recoverable before the Mayor of said city upon proof as in the cases of violating city ordinances.

Sec. 3. And be it further ordained that the City Marshal (whose duty it is to carry this ordinance into effect) or any other person shall be allowed ten per cent. out of the fine for prosecuting violations of this ordinance to effect.

Sec. 4. And be it further ordained, that the Recorder, at the city's expense, shall furnish a book to register the names of persons and dates to whom licenses are granted, with the amount of stock for which Registry and license he shall receive one dollar fees and persons to whom licenses are granted shall post them in a conspicuous place in the store or grocery so licensed.

Sec. 5. And be it further ordained, that where the stock in trade is increased after the license is granted during the continuance of such license, such person or persons shall report the same to the Recorder, who shall be governed as in the first section of this ordinance, and claim the same proportion of license money for the benefit of the city, as there has been stock added; viz: one dollar for one hundred dollars worth a year; fifty cents for the same amount, six months; and in like manner for all sums any length of time; and subject to the same penalty for neglect, refusal or non-compliance as is provided in the second section of this ordinance.

Sec. 6. And be it further ordained that the Recorder shall deduct from the license money, the amount which may have been taxed by the city assessors and collectors for the current year.

Passed Dec. 16, 1843.

JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor. WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

An Ordinance concerning the Landing of Steam Boats in Nauvoo.

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the City of Nauvoo, that hereafter every Steamboat, ascending or descending the Mississippi river, which shall land within the limits of said city to discharge freight or passenger, or to take on freight or passenger, shall pay to the Wharf-master one dollar, as tax for the use or benefit of said city; and said Wharf-master, who shall annually be appointed by the said City Council, shall give a bond with security, of two hundred dollars to the Recorder, and be sworn, for the faithful performance of his duty, and shall make quarterly returns to the Treasury of all moneys collected, retaining fifty per cent for collecting; the first year.

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained, that in case of refusal of any Steamboat to pay said charge, said Wharf-master is hereby empowered to seize said boat or a sufficient quantity of her furniture or tackle and expose it for sale within five days after to pay said charge and costs.

Passed Dec. 16, 1843.

JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor. WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

By the City Council of the City of Nauvoo, W. W. Phelps was duly elected counselor in place of counselor Kimmons who was absent.

Jonathan Dunham was duly elected Wharf-master of the city for one year.

Resolved, That the office of City Attorney be vacated for the time being, and that the Recorder give notice accordingly.

Heber C. Kimball was duly elected city auctioneer in place of Charles W. Foster removed.

Passed Dec. 16, 1843.

JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor. WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

IMPORTANT FROM TEXAS.

TEXAS TRACHEARY AND BRITISH SCHEMING!!

The New Orleans Tropic contains a letter from Galveston, Texas, under date of the 13th ult., which conveys news of an important character, if true. The Tropic says its correspondent's means of obtaining important information are equal to any gentleman's in the Republic, and that his statements may be implicitly relied on, and adds, "we know that his information is derived from the very highest and most undoubted sources." The letter says:—

"General Murphy, U. S. Charge to Texas, has left the seat of Government (Washington) and is now in this city. Strange rumors are afloat about the cause of his removal from thence, and other matters connected therewith. Mr. Abel, bearer of despatches for the United States Government, who was wrecked on the Sarah Barnes, will, I hope, be more fortunate on the schooner Galveston, which conveys this letter, and reach his government in safety. On his arrival at Washington city, there will be some strange developments made public, which are topics of general conversation in Texas. Although you will discover nothing but 'dark hints' from the press, I will draw aside the veil, Messrs. Editors, for your especial benefit, as I remember to have seen in your paper frequent predictions of the very treason which I have now the mortification to announce. It is this: that Gen. Murphy suspected some secret machinations between the British and Texian governments, highly detrimental to the United States interests, and forthwith set about discovering the nature of the mystery. This he was enabled to do during President Houston's absence at the Indian Treaty Ground—he being furnished with well authenticated copies of the entire treasonable correspondence held by the President with the representatives of the British and Mexican Governments—binding himself to send commissioners to recognize the nominal sovereignty of Mexico, provided that government, will thereupon cede Texas to Great Britain for a consideration!

Texians will then be a British province, by cession from Mexico, and consequent of the Executive of the Republic!—the confirmation of the Senate and sanction of the people can be relied on, it is supposed, after sustaining the ordeal through which the President has led them. Once a province of Great Britain, and the immediate abolition of slavery follows as a matter of course; but a consideration is secured for the slaveholder. Free ports, cheap goods, smuggling, and the consequent influx of European population will soon compensate the people for the empty name of a Republic, which has mocked their ears during Houston's arbitrary reign! But what, you ask, is to be the traitor's reward? Governor General for life, with a large salary, and a high sounding title, will bribe Houston to sell his country!! The correspondence which I allude to fully explains the mystery of the President's war against the navy. The vessels were to have been sold in New Orleans last spring, after which the Mexican navy were to take Galveston and control the coast—to be secured by a formidable in-land invasion. The cession to England was then to follow, by agreement, and the people of Texas were to look upon their new masters as very generous, and adopt any form of Government that their deliverance might prescribe. The consummation of Commodore Moore defeated this well contrived plan, and he deserves the execration of every lover of the 'British policy.' I believe that a plan is now maturing for the delivery of Texas into the hands of the Mexicans this fall.

I have given you the outlines of the mysterious and secret policy of President Houston, which has been so long misinterpreted by his friends, and scarce believed possible by his enemies. You learn full particulars from your own Government in a very short time, fully confirmed all that I have said.

The above facts have been withheld by the press in Texas; but as they are topics of daily conversation in the street, I see no objection to calling on Louisiana to watch her neighbor! You may rest assured, gentlemen, that I am revealing to you no vague rumor, but facts which have been derived from the most indisputable sources.

NAUVOO COMB MANUFACTORY.

THE subscriber, late from Philadelphia, would respectfully inform the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity, that he has commenced manufacturing combs of every variety at his manufactory, on the corner of Young and Rich Streets, opposite Mr. Moses Smith's Store, three quarters of a mile east of the Temple; which he will sell wholesale or retail, cheaper than can be purchased in St. Louis, or any western market. All merchants, and others, who wish to patronize home manufacture, would do well to call and examine his work and prices before purchasing elsewhere.

N. B. Horns wanted at a liberal price, in exchange for combs or cash.

LOST.

ABOUT six weeks ago a company of saints arrived in this place escorted by Elder Wandal who had in his charge a trunk belonging to Jane Elizabeth Manning—Sister Manning was not here then but has since arrived and can obtain no intelligence of her trunk; it is presumed that some one has got it in mistake as there was a number of passengers arrived at the same time. The trunk is about three feet long and covered with a light red hair skin, with the exception of the back, on which there is some white. It is directed Jane Elizabeth Manning, Nauvoo. Whoever will give such information as shall lead to the discovery of the trunk will be handsomely rewarded by applying to this office.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan? Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr. James M. Martineau. Inquire for Dr. James M. Martineau's Invaluable remedy for the cure of Fevers.

For Dr. James M. Martineau's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.

For Dr. James M. Martineau's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills.

For Dr. James M. Martineau's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.

For Dr. James M. Martineau's Cephalic Snuff, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that, in their curative virtues may be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having reached riper years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr. James M. Martineau is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fondest expectations: that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by all future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

November 22d, 1843.

City of Nauvoo:

The subscriber takes great pleasure in calling the attention of the public, to the above invaluable remedies; believing that they are a medicine that will tend to secure the health of this city. That they act most mildly, and yet most efficaciously; in uniformity with the laws of nature; and that they are composed of mild herbs.

Knowing from experience that no Pill possesses more virtue in their curative properties. Their worth can only be estimated by a fair trial and by following the accompanying directions. The undersigned can produce a host of the most respectable testimony in their favor, and doubts not but a discerning public, will, in the use of them, secure to themselves, that highest boon of heaven—health.

ROBERT CAMPBELL.

The above medicines may be obtained in various stores in the city, and at his House, opposite the Nauvooansion.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPBELL'S LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The ber Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents,) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

POETRY.

THE GREEN HILLS OF MY FATHER LAND.

The green hills of my father-land
In dreams still greet my view;
I see once more the waving strand—
The ocean-depth of blue—
The sky—the glorious sky outspread
Above their calm repose—
The river of its rocky bed
Still singing as it flows—
The stillness of the Sabbath hours,
When men go up to pray—
The sunlight resting on the flowers—
The birds that sing among the bowers
Through all the summer-day.

Land of my birth!—mine early love!
Once more I breathe thee
I see thy proud hills tower above—
Thy green vales sleep beneath Thy groves, thy rocks, thy murmuring rills,
All risk before mine eyes—
The dawn of morning on thy hills,
Thy gorgeous sunset skies—
Thy forests, from whose deep recess
A thousand streams have birth,
Gleaming the lonely wilderness,
And filling the green silentness
With melody and mirth.

I wonder if my home would seem
As lovely as of yore—
I wonder if the mountain stream
Goes singing by the door;
And if the flowers still bloom as fair
And if the willow climb,
As when I used to trim them there
In the dear olden time.
I wonder if the birds still sing
Upon the garden trees,
As sweetly as in that sweet spring
Whose golden memories gently bring
So many dreams to me.
I know that there hath been a change,
A change of hall and hearth;
Faces and footsteps new and strange,
About my place of birth!

The heavens above are still as bright
As in the days of olden light
That cheer'd my morning sleep;
And hill and vale, and wooded glen,
And rock, and murmuring stream,
That were such glorious beauty then,
Would seem to smile I return again,
The record of a dream!

I mused not for my childhood's hours,
Since in the far-off West,
Nest among the green bowers,
My heart hath found its rest.
I mused not for the hills and streams
That chain'd my steps so long,
Yet still I see them in my dreams,
And hear them in my song;
And often by the hearth's fire's blaze,
When winter eves shall come,
We'll sit and talk of other days,
And sing the well-remembered lays
Of my green mountain home!

SAVING SEED CORN.

Very few planters have paid attention to the selection of seed for planting, that their own interests demand. It is a principle of vegetable as well as of animal life, that "like produces like." Every one who raises good stock, is not only aware of the truth of this, but he carries it out in his selections of animals to breed from. He selects his finest calves and pigs, and saves them from the slaughter pen, because, being well formed, large and thrifty, he believes that their offspring will possess those qualities. But although the same thing is true in the vegetable kingdom, he seldom thinks of saving himself of the advantage of a judicious selection in his seed for planting. Some have heeded it, and by care, and a judicious selection, year after year, have brought their corn to a high state of perfection; and their neighbors, seeing their success, have eagerly sought these improved seed. It would do well the first year, but after that gradually deteriorate to the common standard, and the whole thing be pronounced a humbug. The humbug, however, was not in the original improvement, but in the subsequent neglect. The improver commenced by carefully selecting from his field those stalks that bore two fine, large ears, and laying them carefully aside for planting. The next year he selected with as much care from the product of his former selection; and by keeping up this system, reaped each year a richer harvest. Whereas, the other, who commenced with his neighbor's fine seed, by gathering indiscriminately into his barn, and selecting his seed from the mass in the spring, would be as likely to get the ears from an inferior as from a good stock, and thus his seed would, by a law of nature, deteriorate to the common standard.

We believe that it is perfectly practicable to have almost every stalk bearing two good ears, on land where but one would be produced according to the usual method of selecting seed. This is not a mere opinion. It has been tried, repeatedly, and with entire success, by various persons. What has been called the Dunton, the Cook, and the Williams corn, have all owed their celebrity to the judicious selection of seed for a series of years, by the respective gentlemen whose name they bear. True, it requires some little trouble to select every year; but every planter should have enough of professional pride in improving his system of husbandry, to take the necessary trouble, especially when he is so richly paid by an increased harvest.—[Columbia Planter.]

Butter.—In Holland, where butter making has arrived at the greatest perfection, and whose butter brings the highest price of any brought into the European markets, the following method of curing butter is observed:—The butter, immediately after being taken out of the churn, is put into a shallow vessel, and carefully washed with pure cold water. It is then worked with a slight sprinkling of fine salt, whether for immediate use or packing. If intended for packing, the butter is worked up twice or thrice a day, with soft, fine salt, for three days, in a flat tub, there being about two pounds of this salt allowed for fourteen pounds of butter; the butter is then hard packed by thin layers into casks, which casks are previously carefully seasoned and cleaned. They are always of oak, well smoothed inside. Before being used, they are allowed to stand three or four days, filled with sour whey, and thereafter carefully washed out and dried.

We beg our dairy women, says Judge Buel, to mark two points in the preceding process. 1. No salt is used but what is incorporated with, and dissolved in the butter, and which is necessary to give it flavor; and, 2. The butter intended for keeping is worked from six to ten times, to incorporate the salt, and to separate from it every particle of liquid, which, if left in it, would induce rancidity.

Dr. Anderson recommended for preserving butter, a composition of salt two parts, saltpetre one part, sugar one part; one ounce of this mixture to sixteen ounces of butter. Butter thus prepared, will keep for a long time, but does not taste well for the first three or four weeks.

Preserving sweet Potatoes.—We copy the following method of preserving potatoes from the American Agriculturist's Almanac:—

Select a dry place, level the earth, and lay a bed of dry straw so as to form a circle of about six feet in diameter. On this straw pile up the potatoes until they form a cone four or five feet high, over which spread a little dry grass. Then cover the entire cone with corn-stalks set up endwise, with the butts resting on the ground, and the tops reaching over the apex, of a sufficient thickness to conceal all of the potatoes. Then cover the whole pile with earth to a depth of at least a foot, without leaving an air-hole at the top, as is frequently done. A small shelter should then be made so as to prevent the rains from washing off the earth. This may be done by inserting in the ground four forked stakes, on which rails may be placed to support the covering, which may consist of boards, bark, thatch or other substances. Potatoes can be preserved in this manner until June, nearly as fresh as when put up.

Preparation for Winter.—With farmers it is important to have all necessary preparations for the hard weather that is approaching. It is as essential to save crops as to make them, and too often it is the case that gathering is delayed too long. Corn after maturity loses daily till housed.

Sweet potatoes should be put away before frost, and Irish potatoes are liable to injury after the cold sets in. Above all things, have preparations to shelter stock of every kind. Milch cows cannot be kept in good condition without protection from the pelting storms, and they will not give half the milk.

An open shelter, with a southern exposure, is easily constructed, and answers an admirable purpose. Sheep should have shelters where they can escape the cold rains, and lie down on dry places.

Hogs are the better to have protection from the rain. Care, however, should be taken that their sheds be taken free from wet straw, corn husks or anything that will induce diseases of the skin. It is important that their apartments have all the dirt and litter scraped out every few days. The secret of having stock in good condition through winter is to have them fat at the start, and then commence feeding early, and be sure that they have regular attention and are not suffered to fall off. One good animal well attended is worth more than two inferior ones neglected. A fat, strong farm horse will do more work than two feeble, poor animals. Keep no more animals than can always be in condition, is the secret of success, and it is to be regretted few adhere to this rule.—Tenn. Agr.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:—

If any people ever had reason to render up thanks to the Supreme Being for parental care and protection extended to them in all the trials and difficulties to which they have been from time to time exposed, we certainly are that people.—From the first settlement of our forefathers on this continent—through the dangers attendant upon the occupation of a savage wilderness—through a long period of colonial dependence—through the war of the revolution—in the wisdom which led to the adoption of the existing republican form of government—in the hazards incident to a war subsequently waged with one of the most powerful nations of the earth—in the increase of our population—in the spread of the arts and sciences, and in the strength and durability conferred on political institutions emanating from the people, and sustained by their will, the superintendence of an overruling Providence has been plainly visible.

As preparatory, therefore, to entering once more upon the high duties of legislation, it becomes us humbly to acknowledge our dependence upon Him as our guide and protector, and to implore a continuance of His parental watchfulness over our beloved country. We have new cause for the expression of our gratitude in the preservation of the health of our fellow citizens, with some parental and local exceptions, during the past season—for the abundance with which the earth has yielded up its fruits to the labors of husbandmen—for the renewed activity which has been imparted to commerce—for the revival of trade in all its departments—for the increased rewards attendant on the exercise of the mechanic arts—for the continued growth of our population, and the rapidly reviving prosperity of the whole country. I shall be permitted to exchange congratulations with you, gentlemen of the two Houses of Congress, on these auspicious circumstances, and to assure you, in advance, of my ready disposition to concur with you in the adoption of all such measures as may be deemed by you to be necessary for the glory of our common country.

Since the last adjournment of Congress, the Executive has relaxed no effort to render inextinguishable the relations of amity which so happily exist between the United States and other countries. The treaty lately concluded with Great Britain has tended greatly to increase the good understanding which a reciprocity of interest is calculated to encourage, and it is most ardently to be hoped that nothing may transpire to interrupt the relations of amity which it is so obviously the policy of both nations to cultivate.

A question of much importance still remains to be adjusted between them.—The territorial limits of the two countries, in relation to what is commonly known as the Oregon Territory, still remains in dispute. The United States would be at all times indisposed to aggrandize themselves at the expense of any other nation; but while they would be restrained by principles of honor, which should govern the conduct of nations as well as that of individuals, from setting up a demand for territory which does not belong to them, they would as unwillingly consent to a surrender of their rights. After the most rigid, and as far as practicable, unbiased examination of the subject, the United States have always contended that their rights appertain to the entire region of country lying on the Pacific, and embracing within 42 degrees and 54 degrees 40 minutes of north latitude. This claim being controverted by Great Britain, those who have preceded the present Executive—acquired, no doubt, by an earnest desire to adjust the matter upon terms mutually satisfactory to both countries—have caused to be submitted to the British Government propositions for settlement and final adjustment; which, however, have not proved heretofore acceptable to it. Our Minister at London has, under instructions, again brought the subject to the consideration of that Government; and, while nothing will be done to compromise the rights or honor of the United States, every proper expedient will be resorted to in order to bring the negotiation, now in the progress of resumption, to a speedy and happy termination. In the mean time, it is proper to remark that many of our citizens are either already established in the Territory, or are on their way thither, for the purpose of forming permanent settlements, while others are preparing to follow; and in view of these facts, I must repeat the recommendation contained in previous messages, for the establishment of military posts at such places on the line of travel as will furnish security and protection to our hardy adventurers against hostile tribes of Indians inhabiting those extensive regions. Our laws should also follow them, so modified as the circumstances of the case may seem to require. Under the influence of our free system of government, new republics are destined to spring up, at no distant day, on the shores of the Pacific, similar in policy and in feeling to those existing on this side of the Rocky Mountains, and giving a wider and more extensive spread to the principles of civil and religious liberty.

I am happy to inform you that the cases which have arisen, from time to time, of the detention of American vessels by British cruisers on the coast of Africa, under pretence of being engaged in the slave trade, have been placed in a fair train of adjustment. In the case of the William and Francis, full satisfaction will be allowed. In the cases of the Tygris and Seamew, the British Government admits that satisfaction is due. In the case of the Jones, the sum accruing from the sale of that vessel and cargo will be paid to the owners, while I cannot but flatter myself that full indemnification will be allowed for all damages sustained by the detention of the vessel; and in the case of the Douglas, her Majesty's Government has expressed its determination to make indemnification. Strong hopes are therefore entertained that most, if not all of these cases, will be speedily adjusted. No new cases have arisen since the ratification of the treaty of Washington; and it is confidently anticipated that the slave trade, under the operation of the eighth article of that treaty, will be altogether suppressed.

The occasional interruption experienced by our fellow citizens engaged in the fisheries on the neighboring coasts of Nova Scotia, has not failed to claim the attention of the Executive. Representations upon this subject have been made; but, as yet, no definitive answer to those representations has been received from the British Government.

Two other subjects of comparatively minor importance, but nevertheless of too much consequence to be neglected, remain still to be adjusted between the two countries. By the treaty between the United States and Great Britain, of July 1815, it is provided that no higher duties shall be levied in either country on articles imported from the other, than on the same articles imported from any other place. In 1836, rough rice, by act of Parliament, was admitted from the coast of Africa, and from other countries, while the same article from all other countries, including the United States, was subjected to the payment of a duty of twenty shillings a quart. Our Minister at London has from time to time brought this subject to the consideration of the British Government, but so far, without success. He is instructed to renew his representations upon it.

Some years since, a claim was preferred against the British Government, on the part of certain American merchants, for the return of export duties paid by them on shipments of woolen goods to the United States, after the duty on similar articles exported to other countries had been repealed, and consequently in contravention of the commercial convention between the two nations seeking to us equality in such cases. The principle on which the claim rests has long since been virtually admitted by Great Britain; but obstacles to a settlement have from time to time been interposed, so that a large portion of the amount claimed has not yet been refunded. Our Minister is now engaged in the prosecution of the claim, and I cannot but persuade myself that the British Government will no longer delay its adjustment.

I am happy to be able to say, that nothing has occurred to disturb in any degree the relations of amity which exist between the United States and France, Austria, and Russia, as well as with the other powers of Europe, since the adjournment of Congress. Spain has been agitated with internal convulsions for many years, from the effects of which, it is to be hoped, she is destined speedily to recover; when, under a more liberal system of commercial policy on her part, or trade with her may again fill its old and (so far as her continental possessions are concerned) its almost forsaken channels—thereby adding to the mutual prosperity of the two countries.

The Germanic Association of Customs and Commerce, which, since its establishment in 1833, has been steadily growing in power and importance, and consists at this time of more than twenty German States, and embraces a population of 27,000,000 of people united for all the purposes of commercial intercourse with each other and with foreign states, offers to the latter the most valuable exchanges on principles more liberal than are offered in the fiscal system of any other European power. From its origin, the importance of the German Union has never been lost sight of by the United States. The industry, morality, and other valuable qualities of the German nation, have always been well known and appreciated. On this subject I invite the attention of Congress to the report of the Secretary of State, from which it will be seen that, while our cotton is admitted free of duty, and the duty on rice has been much reduced, (which has already led to a greatly increased consumption,) a strong disposition has been recently evinced by that great body to reduce, upon certain conditions, their present duty upon tobacco.—This being the first intimation of a concession on this interesting subject ever made by any European power, I cannot but regard it as well calculated to remove the only impediment which has so far existed to the most liberal commercial intercourse between us and them. In this view, our Minister at Berlin, who has heretofore industriously pursued the subject, has been instructed to enter upon the negotiation of a commercial treaty, which, while it will open new advantages to the agricultural interests of the United States, and a more free and extended field for commercial operations, will affect injuriously no existing interest of the Union. Should the negotiation be crowned with success, its results will be communicated to both Houses of Congress.

I communicate herewith certain despatches received from our Minister at Mexico, and also a correspondence which has recently occurred between the Envoy from that Republic and the Secretary of State. It must be regarded as not a little extraordinary, that the Government of Mexico, in anticipation of public discussion, (which it has been pleased to infer, from newspaper publications, as likely to take place in Congress, relating to the annexation of Texas to the United States,) should have so far anticipated the result of such discussion as to have announced its determination to visit any such anticipated decision by a formal declaration by a formal declaration of war against the United States. If designed to prevent Congress from introducing that question as a fit subject for its calm deliberation and final judgment, the Executive has no reason to doubt that it will entirely fail of its object. The Representatives of a brave and patriotic people will suffer no apprehension of future consequences to embarrass them in the course of their proposed deliberations. Nor will the Executive Department of the Government fail, for any such cause, to discharge its whole duty to the country.

The war which has existed for so long a time between Mexico and Texas, has, since the battle of San Jacinto, attracted much of suffering to individuals, and have kept the borders of the two countries in a state of constant alarm, have failed to approach to any definitive result. Mexico has flitted out no formidable armament, by land or by sea, for the subjugation of Texas. Eight years have now elapsed since Texas declared her independence of Mexico; and during that time, she has been recognised as a sovereign power by several of the principal civilized States. Mexico, nevertheless, perseveres in her plans of re-conquest, and refuses to recognise her independence. The predatory incursions to which I have alluded have been attended, in one instance, with the breaking up of the courts of justice, by the seizing upon the persons of the judges, jury, and officers of the court, and dragging them along with unarmed, and therefore non-combatant citizens, into a cruel and oppressive bondage; thus leaving crime to go unpunished, and immorality to pass uncorrected. A border warfare is evermore to be deprecated; and over such a war as has existed for so many years between these two states, humanity has had great cause to lament. Nor is such a condition of things to be deplored only because of individual suffering attendant upon it. The effects are far more extensive. The Creator of the universe has given man the earth for his resting place, and its fruits for his subsistence. Whatever, therefore, shall make the first, or any part of it, a scene of desolation, affects injuriously his heritage, and may be regarded as a general calamity. Wars may sometimes be necessary; but all nations have a common interest in bringing them speedily to a close. The United States have an immediate interest in seeing an end put to the state of hostilities existing between Mexico and Texas.—They are our neighbors of the same continent, with whom we are not only desirous of cultivating the relations of amity, but of the most extended commercial intercourse, and to practice all the rites of a neighborly hospitality. Our own interests are deeply involved in the matter; since, however neutral may be our course of policy, we cannot hope to escape the effects of a spirit of jealousy on the part of both of the powers. Nor can this Government be indifferent to the fact, that a warfare such as is waged between these two nations is calculated to weaken both powers, and finally to render them—and especially the weaker of the two—the subjects of interference on the part of stronger and more powerful nations; which, intent only on advancing their own peculiar views, may sooner or later attempt to bring about a compliance with terms, as the condition of their interposition, alike derogatory to the nation granting them, and detrimental to the interests of the United States. We could not be expected quietly to permit any such interference to our disadvantage. Considering that Texas is separated from the United States by a mere geographical line—that her territory, in the opinion of many, formed a portion of the territory of the United States—that it is homogeneous in its population, and pursues with the adjoining States, and makes contributions to the commerce of the world in the same articles with them—and that most of her inhabitants have been citizens of the United States, speak the same language, and live under similar political institutions with ourselves,—this Government is bound by every consideration of interest, as well as of sympathy, to see that she shall be left free to act, especially in regard to her domestic affairs, unawed by force, and unrestrained by the policy or views of other countries. In full view of all these considerations, the Executive has not hesitated to express to the Government of Mexico how deeply it deprecates a continuance of the war, and how anxiously it desired to witness its termination. I cannot but think that it becomes the United States, as the oldest of the American Republics, to hold a language to Mexico upon this subject of an unambiguous character. It is time that this war had ceased. There must be a limit to all wars; and if the parent State, after an eight years' struggle, has failed to reduce to submission a portion of its subjects, standing out in revolt against it, and who have not only proclaimed themselves to be independent, but have been recognised as such by other powers, she ought not to expect that other nations will quietly look to their obvious injury, upon a protraction of hostilities. These United States threw off their colonial dependence, and established independent Governments; and Great Britain, after having wasted her energies in the attempt to subdue them for a less period than Mexico has attempted to subjugate Texas, had the wisdom and justice to acknowledge their independence; thereby recognising the obligation which rested on her, as one of the family of nations. An example thus set by one of the proudest as well as most powerful nations of the earth, it could, in no way, disparage Mexico to imitate. While, therefore, the Executive, which exist between the two countries, it cannot permit that Government to control its policy, whatever it may be, towards Texas; but will treat her—as, by the recognition of her independence, the United States have long since declared they would do—as entirely independent of Mexico. The high obligations of public duty may enforce from the constituted authorities of the United States a policy, which the course pursued in by Mexico will have mainly contributed to produce; and the Executive, in such a contingency, will, with confidence, throw itself upon the patriotism of the people, to sustain the Government in its course of action.

Measures of an unusual character have recently been adopted by the Mexican Government, calculated in no small degree to affect the trade of other nations with Mexico, and to operate injuriously to the United States. All foreigners, by a decree of the 23d day of September, and after six months from the day of its promulgation, are forbidden to carry on the business of selling by retail any goods within the confines of Mexico. Against this decree our Minister has not failed to remonstrate.

The trade heretofore carried on by our citizens with Santo Fe, in which much capital was already invested, and which was becoming of daily increasing importance, has suddenly been arrested by a decree of virtual prohibition on the part of the Mexican Government. Whatever may be the right of Mexico to prohibit any particular course of trade to the citizens or subjects of foreign powers, this late procedure, to say the least of it, wears a harsh and unfriendly aspect.

The instigations on the claims recently settled by the convention with Mexico have been partially paid as they have fallen due, and our Minister is engaged in urging the establishment of a new commission, in pursuance of the convention for the settlement of unadjusted claims.

With the other American States our relations of amity and good-will have remained uninterrupted. Our Minister near the Republic of New Granada has succeeded in effecting an adjustment of the claim upon that Government for the schooner "By Chance," which had been pending for many years. The claim for the brig "Morris," which had its origin during the existence of the Republic of Columbia, and indemnification for which, since the dissolution of that Republic, has devolved on its several members, will be urged with renewed zeal.

I have much pleasure in saying that the Government of Brazil has adjusted the claim upon that Government in the case of the schooner "John S. Bryan," and that sanguine hopes are entertained that the same spirit of justice will influence its counsels in arriving at an early decision upon the remaining claims; thereby removing all cause of dissension between two powers whose interests are, to some extent, interwoven with each other.

Our Minister at China has succeeded in inducing a recognition by that Government of the adjustment, effected by his predecessor, of the first claims in the case of the 'Macedonian.' The first instalment has been received by the claimants in the United States.

Notice of the exchange of ratifications of the treaty with Peru, which will take place at Lima, has not yet reached this country, but is shortly expected to be received, when the claims upon that Republic will doubtless be liquidated and paid.

In consequence of a misunderstanding between this Government and that of Buenos Ayres, occurring several years ago, this Government has retained unrepresented at that Court, while a Minister from it has been constantly resident here. The causes of irritation have, in a great measure, passed away; and it is in contemplation, in view of important interests which have grown up in that country, at some early period during the present session of Congress, with the concurrence of the Senate, to restore diplomatic relations between the two countries.

Under the provisions of an act of Congress of the last session, a Minister was despatched from the United States to China, in August of the present year; who, from the latest accounts we have from him, was at Suat, in Egypt, on the 25th of September last, on his route to China.

In regard to the Indian tribes residing within our jurisdictional limits, the greatest vigilance of the Government has been exerted to preserve them at peace among themselves, and to insure them with feelings of confidence in the justice of this Government, and to cultivate friendship with the border inhabitants. This has happily succeeded to a great extent; but it is a subject of regret that they suffer themselves in some instances to be imposed upon by crafty and designing men, and this notwithstanding all the efforts of the Government to prevent it.

The receipts into the treasury for the calendar year 1843, exclusive of loans, were little more than eighteen millions of dollars; and the expenditure, exclusive of payments on the public debt, will have been about twenty-three millions of dollars. By the act of 1842, a new arrangement of the fiscal year was made, so that it should commence on the first day of July in each year. The accounts and estimates for the current fiscal year will show that the loans and treasury notes made and issued before the close of the last Congress, to meet the anticipated deficiency, have not been entirely adequate.

Athough, on the 1st of October last, there was a balance in the treasury, in consequence of the provision then made, of $5,011,032 77, yet the appropriations made by Congress will absorb all of the present means, and a probable deficiency of four million six hundred thousand dollars; and should they be returned upon the treasury during the fiscal year, they will require provision for their redemption. It is not, however, regarded as probable, since they have obviously entered into the currency of the country, and will continue to form a portion of it, if the system now adopted be continued. The loan of 1841, amounting to $5,072,976 88, falls due on the 1st of January, 1845, and must be provided for, or postponed by a new loan. And, unless the resources of revenue should be materially increased by you, there will be a probable deficiency for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1845, of upwards of four millions of dollars.

The decision incident to an enormous, excessive paper circulation, which gave a fictitious value to everything, and stimulated adventure and speculation to an extravagant extent, has been, happily, succeeded by the substitution of the precious metals and paper promptly redeemable in specie; and thus false values have disappeared, and a sound condition of things has been introduced. This transition, although intimately connected with the prosperity of the country, has nevertheless been attended with much embarrassment to the Government, in its financial concerns. So long as the foreign importers could receive payment for their cargoes in a currency of greatly less value than that in Europe, but fully available here in the purchase of our agricultural productions, (their profits being immediately augmented by the operation,) the shipments were large, & the revenues of the Government became superabundant. But the change in the character of the circulation, from a nominal and apparently real value, in the first stages of its existence, to an obviously depreciated value in its second, so that it no longer answered the purposes of exchange or barter, and its ultimate substitution by a sound metallic and paper circulation combined, has been attended by diminished importations, and a consequent falling off in the revenue. This has induced Congress, from 1837, to resort to the expedient of issuing treasury notes; and, finally, of funding them, in order to supply deficiencies. I cannot, however, withhold the remark, that it is no way compatible with the dignity of the Government that a public debt should be created in time of peace, to meet the current expenses of the Government, or that temporary expedients should be resorted to an hour longer than it is possible to avoid them. The Executive can do no more than apply the means which Congress places in its hands for the support of Government; and, happily for the good of the country, and for the preservation of its liberties, it possesses no power to levy exactions on the people, or to force from them contributions to the public revenue in any form. It can only recommend such measures as may, in its opinion, be called for by the wants of the public service, to Congress, with whom alone rests the power to 'lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.' This duty has, upon several occasions heretofore, been performed. The pleasant condition of things gives a flattering promise that trade and commerce are rapidly reviving; and, fortunately for the country, the sources of revenue have only to be opened, in order to prove abundant.

While we can anticipate no considerable increase in the proceeds of the sales of the public lands, for reasons perfectly obvious to all, for several years to come, yet the public lands cannot otherwise than be regarded as the foundation for the public credit. With so large a body of the most fertile lands in the world under the control and at the disposal of the Government, no one can reasonably doubt the entire ability of the Government to meet its engagements under every emergency. In seasons of trial and difficulty similar to those through which we are passing, the capitalist makes his investments in the Government stocks with the most assured confidence of ultimate reimbursement; and whatever may be said in a period of great financial prosperity, such as existed for some years after 1833, I should regard it as suicidal, in a season of financial embarrassment, to alienate either the lands themselves, or the proceeds arising from their sales. The first and paramount duty of those to whom may be intrusted the administration of public affairs, is to guard the public credit. In re-establishing the credit of this central Government, the readiest and most obvious mode is taken to restore the credit of the States. The extremities can only be made sound by producing a healthy action in the central Government; and the history of the present day fully establishes the fact, that an increase in the value of the stocks of this Government will, in a majority of instances, be attended by an increase in the value of the stocks of the States. It should, therefore, be a matter of general congratulation, that amidst all the embarrassments arising from surrounding circumstances, the credit of the Government should have been so fully restored that it has been enabled to effect a loan of $7,000,000, to redeem that amount of treasury notes, on terms more favorable than any that have been offered for many years. And the six per cent. stock which was created in 1812, has advanced in the hands of the holders to nearly twenty per cent. above its par value. This confidence of the people in the integrity of their Government has thus been signally manifested. These opinions relative to the public lands do not in any manner conflict with the observance of the most solemn duties of the Government in the work of its reclamation. In securing to all such their rights of preemption, the Government performs but an act of rational justice for sufferings and labors endured, and finds ample remuneration in the comforts which its policy insures and the happiness which it imparts.

Should a revision of the tariff, with a view to revenue, become necessary in the estimation of Congress, I doubt not you will approach the subject with a just and enlightened regard to the interests of the whole Union. The principles and views which I have heretofore had occasion to submit, remain unchanged. It can, however, never be too often repeated, that the prominent interest of every important pursuit of life requires, for success, permanency and stability in legislation. These can only be attained by adopting as the basis of action, moderation in all things, which is as indispensably necessary to secure the harmonious action of the political as of the animal system. In our political organization, no one section of the country should desire to have its supposed interests advanced at the sacrifice of all others; but upon being brought into contact, equally precious to all, should be fostered and sustained by mutual concessions and the cultivation of that spirit of compromise from which the Constitution itself proceeds.

You will be informed, by the report from the Treasury Department, of the measures taken under the act of the last session authorizing the reissue of treasury notes in lieu of those then outstanding. The system adopted, in pursuance of existing laws, seems well calculated to save the country a large amount of interest, while it affords conveniences, and obviates dangers and expense in the transmission of funds to disbursing agents. I refer you, also, to that report, for the measures proposed by the Secretary to increase the revenue, and particularly to that portion of it which relates to the subject of the warehousing system, which I earnestly urged upon Congress at its last session, and as to the importance of which my opinion has undergone no change.

In view of the distressed condition of the currency at the time, and the high rates of exchange between different parts of the country, I felt it to be incumbent on me to present to the consideration of your predecessors a proposition, conflict with the rights of the States, and having the sanction (not in detail but in principle) of some of the eminent men who had preceded me in the executive office. That proposition contemplated the issuing of treasury notes, of denominations of no less than five or more than one hundred dollars, to be employed in payment of the obligations of the Government in lieu of gold and silver, at the option of the public creditor, and to amount not exceeding $15,000,000. It was proposed to make them receivable everywhere, and to establish at various points depositories of gold and silver, to be held in trust for the redemption of such notes, so as to insure their convertibility into specie. No doubt was entertained that such notes would have maintained a par value over the Union, thereby meeting the just expectations of the people, and fulfilling the duties of a parental Government. Whether the depositories should be permitted to sell or purchase bills, under very limited restrictions, together with all its other details, was submitted to the wisdom of Congress, and was regarded as of secondary importance. I thought then, and think now, that such an arrangement would have been attended with the happiest results. The whole matter of the currency would have been placed where, by the Constitution it was designed to be placed—under the immediate supervision and control of Congress. The action of the Government would have been independent of all corporations, and the emergency which tests unceasingly on the specie currency, and guards it against adulteration, would also have rested on the paper currency; to control and regulate its issues, and protect it against depreciation. The same reasons which would forbid Congress from parting with the power over the coinage, would seem to operate with nearly equal force in regard to any substitution for the precious metals in the form of a circulating medium. Paper, when substituted for specie, constitutes a standard of value by which the operations of society are regulated; and whatsoever causes its depreciation, affects society to an extent nearly, if not quite, equal to the adulteration of the coin. Nor can I withhold the remark, that its advantages, contrasted with a Bank of the United States—a bank from the fact that a bank was esteemed obnoxious to the public sentiment, as well on the score of expediency as of constitutionality—appeared to me to be striking and obvious. The relief which a bank would afford by an issue of $15,000,000 of its notes, judging from the experience of the late United States Bank, would not have occurred in less than fifteen years; whereas, under the proposed arrangement, the relief arising from the issue of fifteen millions of dollars of treasury notes would have been consummated in one year; thus furnishing, in one-fifteenth part of the time in which a bank could have accomplished it, a paper medium of exchange, equal in amount to the real wants of the country, and of value with gold and silver. The saving to the Government would have been equal to all the interest which it has had to pay on treasury notes of previous issues, as well as subsequent issues; thereby relieving the Government, and at the same time, affording relief to the people. Under all the responsibilities attached to the act of the first session, I submitted the suggestion to its consideration at two consecutive sessions. The recommendation, however, met with no favor at its hands. While I am free to admit that the necessities of the times have since become greatly ameliorated, and that there is good reason to hope that the country is safely and rapidly emerging from the difficulties and embarrassment which every where surround it in 1841, yet I cannot but think that its restoration to a sound and healthy condition would be greatly expedited by a resort to the expedient in a modified form.

The operations of the treasury now rest on the act of 1789, and the resolution of 1816; and those laws have been so administered as to produce as great a quantum of gold to the country as their provisions are capable of yielding. If there had been any distinct expression of opinion going to show that public sentiment was adverse to the plan, either as heretofore recommended to Congress, or in a modified form, while my own opinion in regard to it would remain unchanged, I should be very far from again presenting it to your consideration. The Government has originated with the States and the people, for their own benefit and advantage; and it would be subversive of the foundation-principles of the political edifice which they have reared, to persevere in a measure which, in their mature judgments, they had either repudiated or condemned. The will of our constituents, clearly expressed, should be regarded as the light to guide our footsteps; the true difference between a monarchial or aristocratic government and a republic being, that, in the first, the will of the few prevails over the will of the many; while, in the last, the will of the many should be alone consulted.

The report of the Secretary of War will bring you acquainted with the condition of that important branch of the public service. The army may be regarded, in consequence of the small number of the rank and file in each company and regiment, as little more than a nucleus around which to rally the military force of the country in case of war, and yet its services in preserving the peace of the frontiers are of a most important nature. In all cases of emergency, the reliance of the country is properly placed in the militia of the several States; and it may well deserve the consideration of Congress, whether a new or more perfect organization might not be introduced, looking mainly to the volunteer companies of the Union for the present, and of easy application to the great body of the militia in time of war.

The expenditures of the War Department have been considerably reduced in the last two years. Contingencies, however, may arise, which would call for the filling up of the regiments with a full complement of men, and make it very desirable to re-muster the corps of dragoons, which, by an act of the last Congress, was directed to be dissolved.

I refer you to the accompanying report of the Secretary for information in relation to the navy of the United States. While every effort has been, and will continue to be made, to retrench all superfluities, and lop off all excrescences which, from time to time, may have grown up, yet it has not been regarded as wise or prudent to recommend any material changes in annual appropriations. The interests which are involved are of too important a character to lead to the recommendation of any other than a liberal policy. Adequate appropriations ought to be made to enable the Executive to fit out all the ships that are now in the course of building, or that require repairs, for active service in the shortest possible time, should any emergency arise which may require it. An efficient navy, while it is the cheapest means of public defence, enlists in its support the feelings of pride and confidence which brilliant deeds and heroic valor have heretofore served to strengthen and confirm.

I refer you particularly to that part of the Secretary's report which has reference to recent experiments in the application of steam and in the construction of war steamers, made under the superintendence of distinguished officers of the navy. In addition to other manifest improvements in the construction of the steam engine, and application of the motive power, which has rendered them more appropriate to the uses of ships of war, one of those officers has brought into use a power which makes the steamship most formidable either for attack or defence. I cannot too strongly recommend this subject to your consideration, and do not hesitate to express my entire conviction of its great importance.

I call your attention, also, to that portion of the Secretary's report which has reference to the act of the late session of Congress, which prohibited the transfer of any balance of appropriation from other heads of appropriation to that for building, equipment, and repair. The repeal of that prohibition will enable the department to give renewed employment to a large class of workmen who have been necessarily discharged, in consequence of the want of means to pay them—a circumstance attended, especially at this season of the year, with much privation and suffering.

It gives me great pain to announce to you the loss of the steamship 'The Missouri,' by fire, in the Bay of Gibraltar, where she had stopped to renew her supplies of coal, on her voyage to Alexandria, with Mr. Cushing, the American Minister to China, on board. There is ground for high commendation of the officers and men for the coolness and intrepidity and perfect submission to discipline. Surrounded by a raging fire, which the utmost exertions could not subdue, and which threatened momentarily the explosions of her well-supplied magazines, the officers exhibited no signs of fear, and the men obeyed every order with alacrity. Nor was she abandoned until the last gleam of hope of saving her had expired. It is well worthy of your consideration whether the losses sustained by the officers and crew in this unfortunate affair should not be reimbursed to them.

I cannot take leave of this painful subject without adverting to the kind renderings upon the occasion by the British authorities at Gibraltar, and the commander, officers, and crew of the British ship of the line 'The Melburn,' which was lying at the time in the bay. Everything that generosity or humanity could dictate was promptly performed. It is by such acts of good will by one to another of the family of nations, that fraternal feelings are nourished, and the blessings of permanent peace secured.

The report of the Postmaster General will bring you acquainted with the operations of that department during the past year, and will suggest to you such modifications of the existing laws as in your opinion the exigencies of the public service may require. The change which the country has undergone of late years in the mode of travel and transportation has offered so many facilities for the transmission of mail-matter out of the regular mail, as to require the greatest vigilance and circumspection in order to enable the officer at the head of the department to restrain the expenditures within the income. There is also too much reason to fear that the franking privilege has run into great abuse. The department nevertheless has been conducted with the greatest vigor, and has attained, at the least possible expense, all the useful objects for which it was established.

In regard to all the departments, I am quite happy in the belief that nothing has been left undone which was called for by a true spirit of economy, or by a system of accountability rigidly enforced. This is, in some degree, apparent, from the fact that the Government has sustained no loss by the default of any of its agents. In the complex, but, at the same time, beautiful machinery of our system of government, it is not a matter of surprise that some remote agency may have failed, for an instant, to fulfil its desired office; but I feel confident in the assertion that nothing has occurred to interrupt the harmonious action of the Government itself, and that, while the laws have been executed with efficiency and vigor, the rights neither of States nor of individuals have been trampled on or disregarded.

In the mean time, the country has been steadily advancing in all that contributes to national greatness. The tide of population continues unbrokenly to flow into the new States and Territories, where a refuge is found, not only for our native-born fellow-citizens, but for emigrants from all parts of the civilized world, who come among us to partake of the blessings of our free institutions, and to add by their labor to swell the current of our wealth and power.

It is due to every consideration of public policy that the lakes and rivers of the West should receive all such attention at the hands of Congress as the Constitution will enable it to bestow. Works in favorable and proper situations on the lakes would be found to be as indispensably necessary, in case of war, to carry on safe and successful naval operations, as fortifications on the Atlantic seaboard. The appropriation made by the last Congress for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi river, has been diligently and efficiently applied.

I cannot close this communication, gentlemen, without recommending to your most favorable consideration the interests of the District. Appointed by the Constitution its exclusive legislators, and forming, in this particular, the only anomaly in our system of government—that of the legislative body being elected by others than those for whose advantage they are to legislate—you will feel a superadded obligation to look well into their condition, and to leave no cause for complaint or regret. The seat of Government of our associated Republics cannot be regarded as worthy of your parental care.

In connexion with its other interests, as those of the whole country, I feel that, at your present session, you should adopt such measures in order to carry into effect the Smithson bequest, as, in your judgment will be best calculated to consummate the liberal intent of the donor.

When, under a dispensation of Divine Providence, I succeeded to the presidential office, the state of public affairs was embarrassing and critical. To add to the irritation consequent upon a long-standing controversy with one of the most powerful nations of modern times, involving not only questions of boundary, (which, under the most favorable circumstances, are always embarrassing,) but, at the same time, important and high principles of maritime law, border controversies between the citizens and subjects of the two countries had engendered a state of feeling, and of conduct, which threatened the most calamitous consequences. The hazards incident to this state of things were greatly heightened by the arrest and imprisonment of a subject of Great Britain, who, acting (as it was alleged) as a part of a military force, had aided in the commission of an act violative of the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and involving the murder of a citizen of the State of New York. A large amount of claims against the United States, and a war of several years' continuance with the savage tribes of Florida still prevailed, attended with the desolation of a large portion of that beautiful territory, and with the sacrifice of many valuable lives. To increase the embarrassment of the Government, individual and State credit had been nearly stricken down, and confidence in the General Government was so much impaired, that loans of small amount could only be negotiated at a considerable sacrifice. As a necessary consequence of the bright which had fallen on commerce and mechanical industry, the ships of the age were thrown out of employment, and the operations of the other had been greatly diminished. Owing to the condition of the currency, exchanges between different parts of the country had become ruinously high, and trade had to depend on a depreciated paper currency in conducting its transactions. I shall be permitted to congratulate the country that, under an overruling Providence, peace was preserved without a sacrifice of the national honor; the war in Florida was brought to a speedy termination; a large portion of the claims on Mexico have been fully adjudicated, and are in a course of payment, while justice has been rendered to us in other matters by other nations; confidence between man and man is in a great measure restored, and the credit of this Government fully and perfectly re-established. Commerce is becoming more and more extended in its operations, and manufacturing and mechanical industry once more reap the rewards of skill and labor honestly applied. The operations of trade rest on a sound currency, and the rates of exchange are reduced to their lowest amount. In this condition of things, I have felt it to be my duty to bring to your favorable consideration matters of great interest, in their present and ultimate results; and the only desire which I feel in connection with the future is, and will continue to be, to leave the country prosperous, and its institutions unimpaired.

MR. ROCKWELL.

The name of this individual is no doubt familiar to most of our readers. He has obtained some celebrity in the world also, not for his reputed virtue, but for his supposed crimes.

It will be recollected that he is the person who was basely and falsely implicated along with Joseph Smith, as the reputed murderer of Ex-Governor Boggs, while Mr. Smith was charged with being 'accessory before the fact.' A vexatious lawsuit was instituted against Joseph Smith wherein he was charged with the above named crime, and finally, after many attempts of the Governor of Missouri to get him into his power, was acquitted by the United States Court for the District of Illinois.

Stories of murder and blood were circulated from Maine to Missouri. They were iterated and reiterated by the newspapers of the whole Union, and painted in the most glowing colors that human ingenuity could invent. Mr. Rockwell was branded as a murderer, and Joseph Smith as accessory before the fact without any other evidence than a story fabricated by some of our glib and unscrupulous politicians, engendered in falsehood, by hearts as dark as crevices, for religious and political effect.

This duncquetry and political corruption has caused an innocent man to be immolated in a Missouri cage for upwards of eight months without the slightest evidence of his guilt or even the most remote evidence of crime leading to his conviction. He was taken without process and committed to jail upon mere suspicion and finally acquitted without shadow of proof having been adduced from beginning to end. This is the way that Missouri treats free born American citizens, and they can obtain no redress.

Mr. Rockwell arrived here on Monday night and has given us some of the details of his history since he was first taken to Missouri to the present time. We shall publish it next week, and we can assure our readers that it will be a most interesting and valuable document, involving not only questions of boundary, (which, under the most favorable circumstances, are always embarrassing,) but, at the same time, important and high principles of maritime law, border controversies between the citizens and subjects of the two countries had engendered a state of feeling, and of conduct, which threatened the most calamitous consequences. The hazards incident to this state of things were greatly heightened by the arrest and imprisonment of a subject of Great Britain, who, acting (as it was alleged) as a part of a military force, had aided in the commission of an act violative of the territorial jurisdiction of the United States, and involving the murder of a citizen of the State of New York. CONCERT.
Mr. Wm. H. Kirtley, will favor the citizens of Nauvoo with a Concert this evening (Thursday) of instrumental and vocal music, at the brick store of Joseph Smith, commencing at 6 1/2 o'clock.
Admission 25 cents.

Dry wood will produce on a moderate estimate, twice as much heat as the same amount of green wood, and save much trouble in kindling fires on cold mornings. To suppose that green wood will actually cause more heat than dry, is as absurd as to suppose that a vessel of hot water will freeze sooner than a cold one.

Sentimental Persons.—We always feel suspicious of a man who is constantly telling how his heart bleeds for poor, suffering humanity; how distressing it is to see so much misery in the world; how unfortunate it is to have such sad sensations. In nine cases out of ten, the persons who talk so beautifully of the duties of charity, benevolence, and sympathy for misfortune, are the first to recoil from the smoke, the filth, the coarse language, and the uncouth manners, which in this world of stern realities, usually make property disgusting.—Give me, says a fine writer, the man that goes about the world doing good as noiselessly as some quiet stream—that makes a meadow green, in so modest a way that the sun cannot see its waters, nor the ear of the blind mole hear its babblings. Real feeling is a quiet principle; it works in silence and retirement; its deepest fountains are generally the stillest; and its strongest spells, are those least soon. It is found not in the sunshine of earth—beneath the fig-tree of luxury; rather seek it on the bleak hill sides, and in the secluded caverns of the world, where the winds of adversity blow, or the serpents of persecution and contumely hiss; for it is in such scenes that its strength is required, and its enduring nature proved.

There are many beings in society who have sensibility, whose hearts will throb, and whose eyes will fill, at the recital of melancholy occurrence; but in what is forcibly called the world, there are few persons of real feeling—of feeling, which, instead of indulging itself in a luxurious and dream-like melancholy, dives into the depth of a sympathy. For the latter, sense, knowledge, and thoughtfulness are necessary. Such feeling is not a mere emotion, but a deep perception, and is to be found oftener with the cheerful and light hearted than with the gloomy-minded man.

All Drunk.—A simple boy one evening went up to a drawing room, one of the bills being rung. When he returned to the kitchen, he laughed immoderately. Some of the servants asking the cause of his mirth, he cried.—What do you think! there were sixteen of them who could not smell the coffee, and were obliged to send for me to do it.

A man, a few days since, said to his neighbor that he had had a dream the night before.

Ab, said the neighbor, what was it? I dreamed that I had been drinking freely of New England, and had fallen into the ditch; and when I awoke I found it was true.

Brief Dialogue.—Hollo! boy—whose is that red house on the top of the hill?

My father's.

Isn't every body that knows his own father—who is yours?

Mother's husband.

That is very probable; but I would like to know who your father and mother are.

I will inform you, sir. They are the parents of an only son, who knows how to practice the wise precepts of King Solomon.

In what way?

By answering a fool according to his folly. —N. O. Crescent City.

A Good Hit.—Soon after the close of the war of 1812, an American vessel with a crew of Yankees, was moored at Catherine's Dock in London. One of the yankees pitched into a large warehouse, and the proprietor, presuming from his appearance that he was a gentleman, thus accosted him:

"Er-fused, can you tell me?"

Here his utterance stopped his speech, and his look kept advanced to his assistance, saying:

"He was going to ask you if you knew why Balaam's ass spoke."

"Well, I guess so," replied Jonathan. "I guess Balaam was a stinging man and could not speak, so his ass spoke for him."

THE TRAP LAND.

I saw a nation with grief—

I heard a nation's wail;

And their deep-toned misery was caught

By every passing gale.

Want guarded every peasant's door,

Swept each mechanic's board;

Yet the earth had seemed—but only seemed

To swell the rich man's hoard.

I saw the nobles of that land,

In pride and pomp roll by;

And I read contempt for the poor man's lot

In every haughty eye.

I heard the infant's cry for bread—

The mother's pining shriek;

And I marked the trace of famine in

The father's sunken cheek.

I saw him cast his eye to heaven,

With a stern and sad appeal;

And I knew he felt that anguish deep

Which the homeless only feel.

Yet still the people of that land

In pride and pomp rolled by;

Nor less contempt for the poor man's lot

Marked every haughty eye.

The people humbly sued for bread,

But their rulers gave a stone;

And they stole their sordid hearts and Mocked.

The peasant's dying groan!

"Low rents—cheap bread," the people cried

H. C. Sherwood resigned his office as assessor and collector for the fourth ward to John P. Greene, and the council accepted the resignation, and confirmed the appointment.

W. Richards, Recorder.
Dec. 21, 1843.

To the Editor of the Neighbor:

Sir: I perceive by the news papers, that the 'Senior Editor of the Pittsburgh Gazette,' during last summer, made a tour to the Great West, and visited Nauvoo, among the rest of his peregrinations.

His communication seems to be dated at Warsaw, about sixteen miles below; and, upon reading the cumbersome mass, made up, and mixed up, with truth and error; sense and nonsense, virtue and vanity; sentiments and suppositions; what was and what never was; and a little of what Herod of Pilate united to self-importance to help the Jewish sects manage Jesus, spun out some two or three columns of matter, which for the sake of brevity, we shall call a 'diarrhea of words.'

It is a little singular, how men can step aside so far from truth, when they endeavor to give the conversations of General Smith. One tries to make him out very wise, and very shrewd. Another, who, (perhaps,) is striving to raise himself by the waistbands of his own breeches, puts him down as an 'impostor'—dipping thousands, by a sort of low cunning that actually baffles all the wisdom of the very sage nineteenth century, as much as the power of pure religion has baffled the surrounding world, from Cain's apostasy till the church went into the wilderness, about 540 years after the crucifixion. The most baneful part of the English language, is her adjectives: 'The Senior Editor says, the prophet's "numerous children," and dependants were at the table, &c.' Now as to the prophet's numerous children, they consist of three sons and one adopted daughter, and his dependants are either orphans or honorable men and women, who know better than to taint the truth with unsavory facts from Warsaw; or perfume virtue with the sulphur of Pittsburg.

Any person who attempts to write for the instruction of the world, ought, in this enlightened age of presses, periodicals, pulpits, and persecution, to have clean hands, before he begins to mix politics with religion; the creation of man, with the election of Henry Clay; the revelations of God, with newspaper bubbles; and the simple opinions of a man in his family, with that of a 'pull' from some 'iron city' or 'coal hole.'

Now really, if Gen. Smith ever answered the strange gentleman any thing as put forth in his perfect goodness of words and wind, in the 'Gazette,' it must have been, as is his usual course, to answer a fool according to his folly. What do men think, that the Mormons are fools? that they can be soaped and slandered at the same time; and Then crop the fowly food,

And lick the hand that raised to shed their blood.

Great God, have mercy on us, for we are tired of being read; and burlesqued; or being quizzed and misrepresented and of being praised to our faces, and slandered behind our backs, by such creeping things as the Senior Editor of the Pittsburgh Gazette.

The Senior says, toward the close of his chaotic flux, no doubt, for the immediate relief of all troubled like himself, and speaking of the Temple, on each of these totem stones is carved a crescent, or figure of the new moon, with the profile of a man's face, as seen in old Almanacs. Well, this climax out jumps, cut flies; you out lightens every thing wise or witty since Nauvoo was incorporated, at least; but I think the 'wandering Juggler' of the West, or more properly, 'the Vampire of old Fort Pitt,' would be as much put to his truth's end to prove by an old Almanac, that the column, plinth or basement, or horizontal image in it was ever seen, known or thought of by any person except the saints—as Adam was to hide his transgression from God, after eating the forbidden fruit in the Garden of Eden—For twelve years, every man that has not had wit enough to know that God blessed the highly and exalted the humble, has strove by lies, folly, satire, and misrepresentation to ridicule and destroy the church of the Latter-Day Saints—and what is the result? That the work has continued to spread to the four quarters of the earth, and Joseph Smith, as the favored of God, has walked upon the burning ploughshare with bare but unblemished feet!—and as a believer of good works for good ends, I am not afraid to predict, that he can cool the choler of kings; soften the wrath of mobs; confound the wisdom of hypocrites; break the yoke of captives; lengthen the cords of Zion; and trouble a priest ridden race with truth and honesty and all heaven will help him! Oh, Senior Editor! you are a hard stone when you snap at Joseph Smith.

NOT THE PROPHET,

Nauvoo, Dec. 25, 1843.

P. S. One word to publishers, that copy fabrications as they appear in such papers, as the 'Gazette,' and all others that take the same course: 'You do more to corrupt the morals, and spoil the hearts of the people than in temperance and infidelity combined; for you, with a priestly smile, gull the community with a lie—and may your own hearts ask, who must be damned? It must needs be that offend comes, but you unto him by whom the offence cometh!'

A FARM FOR SALE.

CONSISTING of four hundred and eighty acres, 160 acres of which being good timber. It is situated in the half-breed tract, Lee county Iowa Territory, one mile north of Montrose, and one half mile from the river opposite Nauvoo. One hundred and fifteen acres are under improvement; there is a one story frame dwelling, a well and stable on the premises. The above farm will be sold cheap, terms easy. For information call at the office of C. L. Higbee, Esq., or at my residence on the above mentioned tract.

P. S. Missouri land will be taken in exchange for the above farm, by applying soon.

NOTICE.

THE subscriber wishes to inform the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity, that he has just received a splendid assortment of Sole and Upper Leather, Findings, Bindings, &c., also an assortment of Shoemakers Findings, consisting of Pegs, Nails, Threads, Bristles, Auls, Heel balls &c. The above articles will be sold cheap for cash, hides, or country produce. Those wishing to purchase will please call at the leather store of the subscriber on Mulholland street one quarter of a mile east of the Temple.

Sole-leather sold from 25 to 27 cents per lb.

JOSEPH HORNE.
Dec. 20, 1843. no34-3m.

THE ONE PRICE STORE.

THE subscribers, from the East, have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods and Groceries, in President Joseph Smith's store, which they offer for sale on as good terms as can be bought in this city; among which is a large assortment of Domestic, Muslins, of a superior quality, also Unbleached Sewing Thread of a very superior article; Blue Knitting Cotton, and a good assortment of Boston Nails, first quality; together with many other articles usually kept in such a store. As we wish to deal honestly with all men, we shall invariably have but one price. Cash and all kinds of country produce taken in exchange, except promised.

BUTLER & LEWIS.
Nauvoo, Dec. 19, 1843. no34-1f.

NOTICE TO EMIGRANTS AND LATTER-DAY SAINTS GENERALLY.

I feel it my duty to say to the brethren generally, and especially those who are emigrating to this place, that there is in the hands of the Trustee in Trust, a large quantity of lands, both in the city and adjoining Townships in this county, which is for sale—some of which belongs to the church and is designed for the benefit of the poor, and also to liquidate debts owing by the church, for which the Trustee in Trust is responsible. Some also is land which has been consecrated for the building of the Temple, and some for the Nauvoo House.

If the brethren who move in here and want an inheritance will buy their lands from the Trustee in Trust, they will thereby benefit the poor, the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and even then only be doing that which is their duty and which I know, by considerable experience, will be vastly for their benefit and satisfaction in days to come. Let all the brethren therefore, when they move into Nauvoo, consult President Joseph Smith the Trustee &c., and purchase their lands of him, and I am bold to say that God will bless them and will hereafter be glad they did so.

We hold ourselves ready at any time to wait upon the brethren and show them the lands belonging to the church and Temple &c., and can be found any day either at President Joseph Smith's Bar Room or the Temple Recorder's Office, at the Temple.

NAUVOO COMB MANUFACTORY.

THE subscriber, from Philadelphia, would respectfully inform the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity, that he has commenced manufacturing combs of every variety at his manufactory, on the corner of Young and Rich Streets, opposite Mr. Moses Smith's Store, three quarters of a mile east of the Temple, which he will sell wholesale or retail, cheaper than can be purchased in St. Louis, or any western market. All merchants and others, who wish to patronize home manufacture, would do well to call and examine his work and prices before purchasing elsewhere.

N. B. Horns wanted at a liberal price, in exchange for combs or cash.

LOST.

ABOUT six weeks ago a company of saints arrived in this place escorted by Elder Wandal who had in his charge a trunk belonging to Jane Elizabeth Manning—Sister Manning was not here then but has since arrived and can obtain no intelligence of her trunk; it is presumed that some one has got it in mistake as there was a number of passengers arrived at the same time. The trunk is about three feet long and covered with a light red half skin, with the exception of the back, on which there is some white. It is directed Jane Elizabeth Manning, Nauvoo. Whoever will give such information as shall lead to the discovery of the trunk will be handsomely rewarded by applying to this office.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan? Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr James M. Martineau.

Inquire for Dr James M. Martineau's Invaluable remedy for the cure of Fevers.

For Dr James M. Martineau's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.

For Dr James M. Martineau's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills.

For Dr James M. Martineau's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.

For Dr James M. Martineau's Cephalic Snuff, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that in their curative virtues they be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having reached riper years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr James M. Martineau is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fondest expectations; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by all future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

November 22d, 1843.

The subscriber takes great pleasure in calling the attention of the public, to the above invaluable remedies; believing that they are a medicine that will tend to secure the health of this city. That they act most mildly, and yet most efficaciously; in uniformity with the laws of nature; and that they are composed of mild herbs. Knowing from experience that no Pills possess more virtue in their curative properties. Their worth can only be estimated by a fair trial and by following the accompanying directions. The undersigned can produce a host of the most respectable testimony in their favor, and doubts not but a discerning public, will, in the use of them, secure to themselves, that highest boon of heaven—health.

ROBERT CAMPBELL.
The above medicines may be obtained in various stores in the city, and at his House, opposite the Nauvooansion.

SEE HERE!

CHEAP BOOT AND SHOE MANUFACTORY!!

The subscriber would respectfully inform the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity that he intends to manufacture Boots and Shoes much cheaper than has been done heretofore in this city. He would also inform the farmers that he will take hides and produce in part pay.

He returns his thanks to the public generally for the liberal patronage heretofore extended, and hopes, in consequence of his reduced prices to merit a still greater share of the patronage of those who wish to encourage home manufacture, and labour rather than compel many of their mechanics to leave this city and their families and seek employment elsewhere in consequence of the Eastern work brought here by our merchants whose only object and aim seems to be to enrich themselves regardless of the sufferings of their own citizens, instead of bringing leather and having it manufactured at home.

His work will be made out of the best materials and workmanship not excelled by any in the city, at the following prices:

MEN'S WORK.
Fine Boots, from 85 to 5.50
Kia do 4.00

MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms; and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their every being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPHOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fevers of this section of country.

FEVER and AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents,) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

NEW-YEAR'S HYMN.

BY W. W. PHILLIPS.

Up, up! for there's a fun'ral pass'd,
And not a mourner seen—
Wake, wake! for there's a new year born,
While all the world's asleep!

'Tis twelve o'clock, and all is well
In beautiful Nauvoo:
The old year's dead; the young one lives
To bless created things.

What though the sun is antipode,
And darkness veils the earth;
The starry skies, like seas of gems,
Are sparkling eyes above.

What though old Death hath called his hosts,
And scared some millions more;
The sons of God will win the world,
And resurrection too.

What though the devil raises mobs
To vex the saints of God;
A little time will take them all,
Where vengeance keeps a feast.

What though the sects all worship, too,
A shadow for a God;
We have the living prophet's voice
To show the better way.

What though distress of nations comes
In dreadful splendor on—
It shows the perfect day is nigh
Of universal peace.

What though the world is thunder struck
At Joseph's glorious deeds,— We'll pray to God for kings and priests
To reign with Christ on earth.

What though we're freemen in exile,
Because we love our friends—
Eternal life's the great reward
And let's be afraid to die!

'Tis eighteen hundred forty four,
And Millerism's fall'd—
There's nothing like eternal truth
To prove the schemes of men.

We'll multiply at God's command,
'Till earth is all subdued;
And then, as Gods, we'll live again
To fill eternity.

So, up ye chosen of the Lord,
In spirit and in truth,
And wish the world a joyous year,
A happy new year, too.

APUSTOLIC LETTER.—(Full.)

OR OUR HOLY LORD

GREGORY,

BY DIVINE PROVIDENCE,

XVI. Pope (of that name),

RELATIVE TO REFRAINING FROM

TRAFFIC IN BLACKS.

(ARMY.)

ROME:—PRINTED AT THE URBAN COLLEGE.

1843.

Gregory XVI. of the Pope (of that name).

For the further remembrance of the Cause

Placed at the supreme head of the Apostolate, and, although with no merits of our own contributing thereto, acting as Vicegerent of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, who, in consequence of his very great love for us, having been made man, deigned to die also for the redemption of the world, we think it falls within the sphere of our pastoral care, that we strive by every means in our power to turn away the faithful from the inhuman traffic in blacks, or in any class of men whatsoever. It is true, when the light of the gospel began first to be diffused, those wretched beings, who at that time were falling in so great numbers into the cruellest servitude, by reason especially of wars then prevailing, felt their condition to be most al-lacked with Christian masters. For, inspired by the Holy Spirit, the Apostles taught slaves themselves on the one hand to obey their masters in the flesh, as they would Christ, and to do the will of God from the heart; while, on the other hand they directed masters to treat their slaves kindly, and to render unto them whatever is just and fair, and also to forego any threats, well knowing that the Lord of these,

as well as of themselves, is in the heavens, and that there is with him no respect of persons.

(1) Since, however, true love towards all was most strongly recommended every where by the law of the gospel, and since Christ our Lord had declared that he would consider as done, or refused unto himself, whatever of kindness and compassion should have been extended or referred to the Federal Kites. (4) Now, were there wanting those who, animated by a still more ardent love for their species, consigned themselves to bondage in order to free others therefrom; many of whom that apostolic man, and also predecessor of ours, of most holy memory, Clement I. testifies that he was acquainted with. (5) In process of time, therefore, now that the darkness of heathen superstition has been more fully dissipated, and when the manners of less civilized communities also have been softened down by the gentle influence of faith working through love, things have come at length to such a pass, that for ages back no persons have been held in slavery among very many nations of Christians. There were, it is true, from time to time, we say it to our very great sorrow, some of the very number of the faithful, who, shamefully blinded by the desire of filthy lucre, did not hesitate to reduce to slavery, in wide-spread and remote lands, Indians, blacks, or other wretched individuals, or else by establishing and gradually enlarging a traffic in those who had been made captives by others, to countenance the shameful conduct of these last. Many Roman Pontiffs, it is true, of glorious memory, predecessors of ours, did not fail, in accordance with their high office, to censure severely the practices of these men, as injurious to their spiritual safety, and disgraceful to the Christian name; and from which also, they clearly saw that this result would follow, that unbelieving nations should be more and more confirmed in their hatred towards our true religion. The Apostolic Letter of Paul III. given May 20, 1537, under the Fisherman's Seal, (St. Peter's) to the Cardinal Arch-Bishop of Toledo, has this same object in view; as well as others in succession still further than this same one, given by Urban VIII. on the 22d of April, 1640, to the "Collector Jurant," of the Apostolic Churches in Portugal; in which letter these individuals are very severely censured by name who dared or presumed to reduce to slavery, to sell, to buy, to exchange, or give away the Indians of the East or West, to separate them from their wives and children, to despoil them of their property, to lead and send them away to other places, or in any way to deprive them of their freedom, to retain them in servitude, and also to afford to those pursuing the aforesaid line of conduct, advice, aid, favor and assistance, under any pretext or color whatever, or to preach or teach that this was lawful, or to aid in any other way whatever the practices above alluded to. (6) Those decrees of the Pontiffs just mentioned, Benedict XIV. subsequently established and renewed by a new Apostolic Letter to the clergy of Brazil, and of certain other regions, given on the 20th day of December, 1741, in which he strove to arouse the anxious feelings of the priests themselves towards this end. (7) Before this also, another Predecessor of ours still earlier than these—Pius II. on the Empire of the Portuguese, being extended in his time to Guinea, a country of the blacks, gave on the 7th Oct. 1462, a letter addressed to the Bishop of Rubi, who was about to set out for those parts, in which he not only bestowed upon that prelate full powers for exercising his sacred functions therein, with greater advantage, but, availing himself of this same opportunity, admonished severely upon those Christians, who were accustomed to drag the Neophytes into slavery. (8) And even in our own times, Pius VII. influenced by the same spirit of religion, and love, as his predecessors, zealously interposed his official influence with those in power, that the traffic in blacks might at length entirely cease among Christians. Those decrees and anxious cares on the part of our predecessors have, with the blessing of God proved of no little avail in protecting the Indians, and others above mentioned, from the cruelty of invaders and from the cupidity of Christian traders. Not to such an extent, however, that this Holy See can congratulate itself on the full success of its zealous efforts for the accomplishment of this end; seeing that the trade in blacks, though somewhat lessened, is still carried on by numerous Christians.

We, therefore, desiring to remove so great a disgrace as this from all the borders of Christianity, and the whole subject being maturely weighed, (some of our venerable brethren the cardinals of the holy Roman Church being also admitted to our council) do hereby, treading in the footsteps of our predecessors, by virtue of our Apostolic Authority, admonish and earnestly adjure in the Lord all faithful Christians of every condition, that no one of them dare for the time to come, to harass unjustly Indians, blacks, or any other persons of this class, or to despoil them of their property, or to reduce them to slavery, or to lend aid or favor to others while doing such things towards them, or to exercise that inhuman traffic, by means of which the blacks, as if they were not human beings, but the merest animals in whatever way reduced to slavery, are without any distinction, in violation of the laws of justice and humanity, bought, sold, and sometimes condemned to the endurance of the most painful labor; and by which, moreover, through the hope of gain, that originally offered itself to the owners of slaves, by means of this same traffic, dissensions also and perpetual hostilities are as it were continually kindled in the countries of those unfortunate men.

We, then, by virtue of our apostolic authority censure all the aforesaid practices as unworthy of the Christian name, and by that same authority we strictly prohibit and interdict any ecclesiastic or layman from presuming to uphold, under any pretext or color whatever, that same traffic in blacks as if it were lawful in its nature, or otherwise to preach [predicare] or in any way whatsoever publicly or privately to teach [docere] in opposition to those things which we have made the subject of admonition in this our apostolic letter. In order, moreover, that this same letter [bull] of ours may the more easily become known unto all, and that no one may allege an ignorance of it, we decree and command it to be promulgated according to custom by one of our messengers at the gates of the church of the first of the apostles [St. Peter's] and of the apostolic chancery, as also at those of the Palace on the Monte Citorio, and in the Campo Di Fiore; and copies of the same to be left affixed in those same places.

Given at Rome, at the Church of St. Maria Major, under the Fisherman's Seal, on the 3d day of December, 1839, in the 9th year of our Pontificate.

ALDOISE LAMBRUCHINI, Cardinal.

ATTEMPT TO ASSASSINATE THE POPE.

A letter from Rome of the 27th ult., in the Gazette de France says:

A report has probably reached you of an attempt to assassinate the Pope. The fact is, that a physician, who is a great revolutionist but driven to desperation by want of money, went one day to the Palace and, although he has a wooden leg, entered as nimbly as if it was his own house. Being met, and asked who he wanted, he replied that he wished to speak to his Holiness on very urgent affairs. With much difficulty he was induced to withdraw. On reaching the court he fired a pistol, without its being perceived that it was he who caused the explosion. The next day he returned again and went on till he met Cajotino, the pontiff's valet, to whom he insisted on being immediately allowed to see the Pope on matters of high interest. His entrance was, however, again refused, and he went away, but was arrested on leaving the Palace. A loaded pistol was found upon him.

MISSOURI JUSTICE.

The following account of an Anti-Abolition meeting taken from the "Missouri Republican" will show with what respect the laws of the land are held in that renowned State. We are no advocates for abolition as it now exists; but if there is no force in the law to regulate abuse, and to rectify wrong. Then indeed has the glory of our stars and stripes faded. The balances have fallen from the hands of justice, & the Goddess of Liberty may hide her head in shame. If any half a dozen scoundrels without legal evidence can, by the dictum of their disordered brain, drive men from their homes, strip them of their shirts, steal men from the State, lash them on the bare back, and hang them by the neck, until they are dead! dead!! dead!!! then indeed have things come to a pretty pass and when the proceedings of such meetings can be published in one of the best journals in the State without note, or comment, we think we have a fair index to the position of the State.—Ed.

ANTI-ABOLITION.

At a meeting of Lewis and Clark counties held in Tully on the 3d of November, 1843;—on motion, James Miller was chosen President and Ralph Smith Vice-President, and James R. Shepherd Secretary.

General O. H. Allen explained the object of the meeting; after which the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That Mr. Gregory, W. F. Lane, S. H. McKim, Wm. Pritchard, Geo. W. Cordell and S. Simpson, be appointed a Judicial committee to hear the allegations preferred against certain individuals, charged with being abolitionists. (Certain negroes having run away and returned—said they were aided by said individuals.)

Which committee, having gone through the testimony, after mature deliberation, came to the conclusion that a large prosecution would not be justified by the evidence, yet being fully persuaded of the guilt of the accused, decided that Dr. D. P. Nelson, be required to leave the State of Missouri, within four days, and that James Botkin be required to leave his present residence, (an island in the Mississippi,) within four days and not to settle within fifty miles of Lewis county, never to be again seen in Lewis or Clark counties. If, after the expiration of the time specified, he be found at his present residence or in its neighborhood, he is to receive 50 lashes on his bare back, well laid on; and if found on the shores of either county in the time specified for his departure, he is to be hanged by the neck till he is dead! dead!! dead!!!

On motion of Gen. Allen, it was unanimously

Resolved, That Mr. Botkin take off his back a shirt which he had feloniously obtained, (and which was proven to be long to A. B. Hyde, then present,) and restore it to its rightful owner; which was done.

After which, it was

Resolved, That Daniel Sigon, Harrison Munday, U. S. Gregory, O. Colly, Chauncey Durkee, and W. B. Smoot, be a committee, whose duty it shall be to devise measures for the more effectually preventing the elopement of slaves, and report to this meeting; which committee, after retiring a few minutes, made the following report, viz:

Whereas existing circumstances make it necessary that prompt and efficient measures be adopted to protect our negro property from the depredations of the abolitionists, who have banded together, for the avowed purpose of stealing our property; and whereas, these recent acts of theft are only equalled by the acts of the most notorious bandit in the annals of history. Therefore, be it

Resolved, That an Anti-Abolition Society be formed, and that the citizens of Lewis and Clark counties be invited to join said society at the earliest opportunity, and that a committee be appointed to draft a suitable constitution and bylaws for the government of said society.

2. That a committee of twelve be appointed, consisting of the following persons, O. Colly, Captain Munday, U. S. Gregory, W. B. Smoot, James Howard, D. Sigon, H. Durkee, G. B. Nelson, G. Sigon, James Johnson, C. Durkee and Charles Simpson, whose duty it shall be to make immediate pursuit after runaway negroes. Each member of the above committee shall appoint a potson in his stead, provided he cannot go himself.

3. That the expenses and reasonable wages be paid to the persons engaged in the pursuit of runaway negroes.

4. That a subscription be made for the purpose of defraying the expenses aforesaid.

5. That a committee be appointed whose duty it shall be to take all such measures as they may deem proper, to counteract the operation of the Abolitionists.

6. That we recommend the propriety of bringing from Illinois, an Abolitionist for each negro they aid in escaping from Missouri.

7. That we will give a reward of $200 for the delivery of Richard Ellis, of Quincy, and $100 for Erasmus Denton Stillman, of Fairfield, when delivered to the committee of vigilance.

8. That it need not be expected that the very lenient punishment inflicted upon David P. Nelson, and James Botkin will be a precedent for the punishment of similar offenders hereafter.

9. That we bind ourselves to pay a reward of $100 for the delivery to us of each runaway negro taken to Illinois.

10. That all negroes found going at large, without a pass, be subject to receive ten lashes from any member of the Anti-Abolition Society.

11. That the "Tully Guards" visit the inhabitants of the islands in the neighborhood of Tully, and that all persons who cannot give a satisfactory account of themselves, be required to leave immediately.

12. That we highly approve the conduct of the anti-abolitionists of Illinois—and that we heartily thank them for their advice and assistance so cheerfully given.

Which preamble and resolutions were, on motion, unanimously adopted.

Resolved, That the papers of Palmyra be requested to give the proceedings of this meeting an insertion, and request all other anti-abolition papers to copy.

Resolved, That the officers of this meeting sign the proceedings.

JAMES MILLER, Pres't.
JAMES SHEPHERD, Sec'y.

MONSTER OF SOUTH AMERICA.

In the marshes, as soon as the rider feels his horse sinking, the first movement, if an experienced traveller, is to throw himself from the saddle, and endeavor to wade or swim to canebreaks, the roots of which give to the ground a certain degree of stability. In that case his fate is probably sealed, as he is in imminent danger of the cayana, This is a terrible and hideous monster, with which strange to say, the naturalists of Europe are not yet acquainted, though it is too well known to all the inhabitants of the streams and lagoons tributary to the Red River. It is an enormous turtle, or tortoise, with the head and tail of the alligator, not refractive, as is usual among the different species of this reptile; the shell is one inch and a half thick, and as impenetrable as steel. It lies in holes in the bottom of muddy rivers or in the swampy canebreaks, and measures often ten feet in length, and six in breadth over the shell, independent of the head and tail, which must give often to this dreadful monster the length of twenty feet. Such an unwieldy mass is not, of course capable of any rapid motion; but in the swamps I mention they are very numerous, and the unfortunate man or beast going astray, and leaving for a moment the small patches of solid ground, formed by the thicker clusters of the canes, must of necessity come within the reach of one of these powerful creature's jaws, always extended and ready for a prey. Cayanas of a large size have never been taken alive, though often, in draining the lagoons, shells have been found measuring twelve feet in length. The planters of Upper Western Louisiana have often fished to procure them for scientific acquisitions; but although they take hundreds of the smaller ones, they could never succeed to drag on shore any of the large ones after they had been looked, as these monsters bury their claws, head, and tail, so deep in the mud, that no power short of steam can make them relinquish their hold. The 'gar' fish is also a most terrible animal. I have seen it more than once seizing its prey, and dragging it down with the rapidity of an arrow. One day, while I was residing at Captain Finn's, upon the Red River, I saw one of these monsters enter a creek of transparent water. Following him from curiosity, I soon perceived that he had not left the deep water without an inducement; for just above me there was an alligator devouring an otter. As soon as the alligator perceived his formidable enemy, he thought of nothing but to escape to the shore; he dropped his prey, and began to climb; but he was too slow for the gar fish, who, with a single dart, closed upon him with extended jaws, and seized him by the middle of the body. I could see plainly through the transparent water, and yet I did not perceive that the alligator made the least struggle to escape from the deadly fangs. There was a hissing noise, as that of shells and bones crushed, and the gar fish left the creek with his victim in his jaws, so nearly severed in two that the head and tail were towing on each side of him. Besides these, the traveller through rivers and bays has to fear many other enemies of less note, and but little, if at all, known to naturalists. Among these is the mud-vampire, a kind of spider, leech, with sixteen short paws round a body of the form and size of the common plate. The centre of the animal (which is black in any other part of the body) has a dark vermilion round spot, from which dart a quantity of black suckers, one inch and a half long, through which they extract the blood of animals; and so rapid is the phlebotomy of this ugly reptile, that though not weighing more than two ounces in its natural state, a few minutes after it is stuck on it will increase to the size of a beaver tail, and weigh several pounds. Thus leeches in a large stream, a horse will often faint before he can reach the opposite shore, and he then becomes a prey to the gar fish. If the stream is but small, and the animal is not exhausted, he will run madly on shore, and roll to get rid of his terrible bloodsucker, which, however, will adhere to him till one or the other of them dies from exhaustion or from reptition. In crossing the Eastern Texas bayous, I used always to descend from my horse to look if the leeches had stuck. The belly and the breast are the parts generally attacked; and so tenacious are these mud-vampires, that the only means of removing them is to pass the blade of a knife under them, and cut them off.—[Monsieur Violet.

YESTERDAY considerable interest was excited by a rather novel spectacle in Manchester. We allude to the visit of a party of the Ojibwe Indians, from the banks of Lake Huron, North America, to the Exhibition Rooms of Mr. Catlin, in Duane Place. The party included two chiefs of the tribe, four warriors, two squaws, and a girl. They had arrived at Liverpool, on Monday last, by the England packet ship, and it is understood the occasion of their visit is business with the government of this country. Mr. Catlin had invited them to visit his rooms, with a view of witnessing the effect that would be produced upon them on being brought suddenly in contact with a collection of objects at a distance from home, with which their associations were so familiar, and certainly the result did not at all disappoint expectation. The astonishment painted in their countenances, on entering the room, is beyond description. It seemed only to be exceeded by the joy which almost immediately succeeded it. One of the war chiefs, who had entered first, gazed for a moment or two in silent amazement; then suddenly raised a yell, expressive of pleasure, which was immediately joined in by the whole party. The same chief, on having a scalp placed before him, immediately raised the war cry, or exclamation uttered by the Indians when in the act of cutting off the scalps in battle, and followed it up with part of the scalp dance and song, brandishing the scalp in one hand and the war club in the other, as usual in these dances.

A number of ladies and gentlemen, including several clergymen, were present when they entered the Exhibition Rooms, and the scene was one which will not easily be forgotten by them. The party remained in the room for some time, examining the war clubs, arrows, &c., and the portraits and landscapes, painted by Mr. Catlin, while on the tours through the Indian settlements. Many of these portraits and scenes appeared to be instantly recognised, and seemed to impart much pleasure to the visitors. They seemed readily to distinguish the tribes to which the portraits belonged by the style of dress and other peculiarities, and the portraits especially, therefore, were objects of deep interest to them, and excited much attention. They are to visit the room again next week, (as will be seen by this advertisement in another column,) when a platform is to be erected for their accommodation, affording much more facility for observation to the visitors who may be present, and Mr. Catlin will be present each day, and will communicate some interesting particulars relative to the peculiar habits and manners of this tribe of Indians. We understand that they stopped for the night with their interpreter, at the Mirror Hotel, Collegiate Church yard, and we believe have expressed much gratification at the attention paid to their wants by their kind host.

DIVINITY.—A Dutch preacher, who was warmly inclined in favor of the revolutionary party during the revolutionary war, appeared once to get into an American camp, on a Sunday, and was consequently called upon for a sermon and a prayer. He, from force of habit, commenced the latter, with "Got bless the king"—whereupon there was considerable excitement among the soldiers, when he perceiving it, with admirable presence of mind:—

"Yes mine hearer! I say, Got bless the king—bless him mit plenty ofhardt times—bless him mit a whip parliament—bless him mit defeats of Indt and on to sea—bless him mit all kinds of bad luck—bless him mit sickness—bless him mit shordt life—unt, Lordt may we have no more of him."

HORRORS OF THE SLAVE TRADE. The British Naval and Military Gazette, in speaking of the condemnation of a slave vessel, says:—

Her instructions contain a tale of horror, requiring no varnishing, to render it a romance. She was commissioned for the coast of Africa, for the Mozambique, and with a crew of ten men, and provisions for fifteen days was to take in 220 slaves, or if small bales—so the slaves are termed—230! easily packed in the hold of a vessel of 44 tons, with a height of thirty-two inches aye, inches between the slave or under the upper deck! Manacles and chains were on board to the number of 900 for another cargo. And with provisions for 15 days with freightful freight, this cargo of human misery, to cross the wide Atlantic, to traverse at a bird's flight, nearly 4000 miles.

Suppose calm or adverse winds or storms occurred, suppose the voyage was delayed for twenty days, to no port date the slave-ship ran, from no vessel dare she ask for assistance. Two hundred and fifty human beings, without water or food, crammed into a space not high enough to sleep when lying down in one position, for twenty days and nights, in a hold fetid with their own filth, without ventilation, with a putrid and foul atmosphere, on a deck thirty-two inches from the ceiling. Can any fiction, can any romance, portray what might have been the bitter agony—the torture of these Africans? A slave can be purchased for ten bars bait, or of ten pieces of blue cloth—say 20 shillings, and will fetch, at Brazil 8430, or often 1120: the immense profit renders the slave traders regardless of human lives; one slave in every ten, if brought to Cuba or Brazil, yields an ample return; and anxious as our cruisers are to check this traffic in blood, the western coast of Africa is too vast and extensive for the fleet employed to watch it.

Working for a Living.—We find the following excellent article in the "Offering" edited by the factory girls in Lowell. It breathes the right spirit, and every mother and daughter father and son should read it.

From whence originated that it was derogatory to a lady's dignity, or a blot upon female character to labor, and who was the first to say sneeringly, "Oh! she works for a living!" Surely, such ideas and expressions ought not to grow on republican soil. The time has been when ladies of the first rank were accustomed to busy themselves in domestic employment. Homer tells us of princesses who used to draw water from the springs, and wash with their own hands the finest of the linen of their respective families. The famous Lucretia used to spin in the midst of her attendants; and the wife of Ulysses, after the siege of Troy, employed herself in weaving until her husband returned from Ithica!

Father Miller.—The Troy Whig says: "Father Miller and his son arrived in this city on Wednesday evening from Whitehall, and took lodgings at the Temperance House, No. 5 Cannon Place. On Thursday morning he departed for the West. The old prophet is in good condition, and bids fair to set the falsity of his own predictions verified."

John Van Buren Esq., and family, sailed for Madeira on Wednesday last.

A FLEET MARRIAGE.

BY AN IRISHMAN.

Lady C. was a beautiful woman, but Lady C. was an extraordinary woman. She was still single, though rather past extreme youth. Like most pretty females, she had looked too high and estimated her own loveliness too dearly, and now she refused to believe that she was not as charming as ever. So no wonder she still remained unmarried.

Lady C. had about five thousand pounds in the world. She owed about forty thousand pounds; so, with all her wit and beauty she got into the Fleet and was likely to remain there.

Now, in the time I speak of every lady had her head dressed by a barber, and the barber of the Fleet was the handsomest barber in the city of London. Pat Phelan was a great admirer of the fair sex, and where was the wonder? Sure Pat was an Irishman. It was one very fine morning, when Phelan was dressing her captivating head, that her ladyship took it into her head to talk to him, and Pat was well pleased, for Lady C.'s teeth were the whitest, and her smile the brightest in the world.

So you're not married, Pat, says she. Devil an inch! your honor's ladyship, says he.

And wouldn't ye like to be married? again asked she.

Would a duck swim? Is there any one you'd prefer?

Maybe, madam, says he, you never heard of Kathleen O'Reilly, down beyond Drovers? Her father's cousin to O'Donoghue, who's own steward to Mr. Murphy, the under-agent to my Lord Kingstown—and—

Hush! says she; shure I don't want to know who she is. But, would she have you if you asked her?

All, thin, I'd only wish I'd be after trying that same.

And why don't you? Sure I'm too poor. And Phelan heaved a piteous sigh.

Would you like to be rich? Does a dog bark?

Is I make you rich will you do I tell you?

Mule, murther! your honor, don't be tantalizing a poor boy.

Indeed I'm not, said Lady C. So listen. How would you like to marry me?

Altho, my lady, I believe the King of Russia himself would be proud to do that same, I have a poor devil like Pat Phelan.

Well, Phelan, if you'll marry me to-morrow, I'll give you a thousand pounds.

Oh! whaboo! whaboo! sure I'm mad, or enchanted by the good people, for Pat, dancing round the room.

But there are conditions, says Lady C. After the first day of our nuptials you must never see me again nor claim me for your wife.

I don't like that, says Pat, for he had been going to see Ladyship most desirably.

But remember Kathleen O'Reilly. With the money I'll give you you go and marry her.

That's true says he. But thin the bigness!

I'll never appear against you, says her ladyship. Only remember you must take an oath never to call me your wife after to-morrow, and never to go telling all the story.

Devil a word I'll ever say.

Well then, says she; there's ten pounds. Go and buy a license, and leave the rest to me; and then she explained to him what he was to do, and when he was to come, and a' that.

The next day Pat was true to his appointment, and found two gentlemen already waiting for his ladyship.

Have you got the license? says she.

Here it is, my lady, says he; and he gave it to her. She handed it to one of the gentlemen who viewed it attentively.

Then, looking at her two servants, she turned to the gentleman who was reading.

Perform the ceremony, says she.

And sure enough in ten minutes Pat Phelan was the husband, the legal husband, of the lovely lady C.

That will do, says she to her new husband, as he gave her a hearty kiss; that'll do.

Now, give me my marriage certificate.

The old gentleman did so; and, bowing respectfully to the five-pound note she gave him he retired with his clerk; but sure enough, I forgot to tell you he was a person.

Go and bring me the warden, says my lady to one of her servants.

Yes, my lady, says she; and presently the warden appeared.

Will you be good enough, says Lady C. in a voice that would call a bird from a tree, will you be good enough to send and fetch me a huckery couch? I wish to leave this prison immediately.

Your ladyship forgets, replied he, that you must pay forty thousand pounds before I can let you go.

I am a married woman. You can't detain my husband, but not me. And she smiled at him, who began rather to dislike the appearance of things.

Patience, my lady, it is well known you are single.

I tell you I am married.

Whom's your husband?

There, sir, and she pointed to the astonished barbers; there he stands. Here is my marriage certificate, which you can peruse at your leisure. My servants yonder were witnesses of the ceremony. Now detain me, sir, one instant at your peril!

The warden was dumb-founded, and no wonder. Poor Phelan would have spoken, but another party would let him. The lawyer below was consulted. The result was evident. In half an hour Lady C. was free, and Pat Phelan her legitimate husband, a prisoner for debt to the amount of forty thousand pounds. Well, sir, for some time Pat thought he was in a dream, and the creditors thought they were still worse. The following day they held a meeting, and finding how they had been tricked, swore they'd detain poor Pat forever. But as they knew he had nothing, and wouldn't feel much shame in going through the insolvent Court, they made the best of a bad bargain and let him out.

Well, you must know, about a week after this, Paddy Phelan, was sitting by his little fire, and thinking over the wonderful things he had seen, when as sure as death the post master brought him a letter, the first he had ever received, which he took over to a friend of his, one Ryan, a fruit seller, because you see, he was no great hand at reading writing, to decipher for him. It ran thus:

Go to Donegal, and marry Kathleen O'Reilly. The instant the knot is tied I will fulfil my promise of making you comfortable for life. But as you value your life and liberty, never breathe a syllable of what has passed. Remember you are in my power if you tell the story. The money will be paid to you directly after you enclose me your marriage certificate. I send you fifty pounds for present expenses.

Oh! happy Paddy! Didn't he start next day for Cork and didn't he marry Kathleen, and touch a thousand pounds? By the powers he did. And what is more, he took a cottage, which perhaps you know, not a hundred miles from Bruffin, in the county of Limerick; and, thin, he forgot his first wife clean and entirely, and never told any one but myself, under a promise of secrecy, the story of his Fleet Marriage!

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 3, 1844.

We are informed that Gov. Ford has ordered the Sheriff of this county to take up those parties engaged in assisting the Missourians to kidnap the Aferies, and to bind them in recognizance to appear at the County Court. We hope it is true as it not only shows that the Governor is determined to sustain law, but relieves us from the unpleasant task of seeing it enforced.

Mr. Avery who was kidnapped has been acquitted by one of the courts of Missouri. I don't remember of ever having notice of such a burlesque upon law before. Missouri sends over her kidnappers in open violation of law and subjects, the parties engaged in this affair to imprisonment in the Penitentiary, and their renegades take their booty and present him before a court, where the laws of the land are gravely put in requisition and a legal farce is acted out, and he is acquitted for want of evidence. These kidnappers, of course, performed an honorable duty, and instead of being sent to the penitentiary, as men thieves, have gained to themselves unfading aurels.

We have been requested to republish the following ordinances for the information of the public, for the specified reason that an influence had been used to show that we had not authority to marry in this city without a license from the county clerk. It would be well for some persons in our city to ask the county clerk whether it is lawful to eat butter with their bread, or to go without; and to enquire which of the two is lawful, to feed their horses on corn or oats?

An Ordinance concerning Marriages. Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that all male persons over the age of seventeen years, and females over the age of fourteen years, may contract and be joined in marriage; Provided, in all cases where either party is a minor, the consent of parents or guardians be first had.

Sec. 2. Any persons as aforesaid wishing to marry, or to be joined in marriage, may go before any regular minister of the gospel, Mayor, Alderman, Justice of the Peace, Judge or other person, authorized to solemnize marriages in this State, and celebrate or declare their marriage in such manner and form, as shall be most agreeable; either with or without licenses.

Sec. 3. Any person solemnizing a marriage as aforesaid shall make return thereof to the city Recorder, accompanied by a recording fee of fifty cents, within thirty days of the solemnization thereof; and it is hereby made the duty of the Recorder to keep an accurate Record of all such marriages. The penalty for a violation of either of the provisions of this ordinance, shall be twenty dollars, to be recovered as other penalties or forfeitures.

Passed February 17, 1842.

JOHN C. BENNETT, Mayor.

JAMES SLOAN, Recorder.

An Ordinance to authorize the city constables, to execute and enforce the ordinances relating to Hogs and Pigs, and to build a Pound in the city of Nauvoo.

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that from and after the passage of this ordinance, the constables are, and shall be authorized to execute and enforce all ordinances relating to swine and hogs.

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained that they are and shall be further authorized to build a suitable pound, to confine any hogs according to the requirements of said ordinances; and to do which, they are and shall be authorized to use any money (not otherwise appropriated) which may be in the Treasury; or they may use the credit of the city to effect the said purpose.

Passed September 18, 1843.

JOHN TAYLOR, Pres. Pro. Tem.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

[For the Neighbor.]

Mr. Editor: At a late hour of the night while watching with my sick family, as they have all fallen into the arms of batmy sleep, I am most happily afforded an hour's respite from administering to their calls. This time is necessarily employed in reflecting upon the course to pursue, in administering means for the restoration of their health; and also, in connection, upon the direful ravages of disease in general, as experienced in this place.

When we consider the local causes, and the various circumstances which contribute to produce disease among the great number of emigrants who come to this place, we need not be at all surprised to see in every paper a number of deaths recorded. We gather here from every land and climate, to fulfil the special commandment of God. Many of us are very poor, having sacrificed almost every dollar we had on earth, to accomplish the route, we thus far answer the characters the Psalmist spoke of when he said, "gather my saints together unto me; they have made a covenant with me by sacrifice." The word of God, the purposes of Jehovah, must be fulfilled in his saints. Consequently an account of our straitened circumstances, we do not cannot get provided for with all the industry we can use, until we have to experience the various vicissitudes of the climate. We are foreigners and must become acclimated, and among such a multitude of persons, many die. Some enquire, why does so many people come Nauvoo to find a grave? The answer is at hand. In complying with the commandments of God, we shall receive a blessing, whether we live or die, we live to the Lord or die to the Lord. When we do, we know we shall rest with Jesus, and the Lord will bring us with him, when he comes to be glorified in his saints, we shall also reign with him. This knowledge makes a saint of God, contemplate with delight on a future state of existence. This makes a Latter-Day saint meet the monster without concern. But all are not Israel who are called Israel. With those reflections, I will add that it is certainly our duty to use the means that the God of heaven has placed in our hands, for the preservation of health, and also for the recovery of the same when lost. To this end we use many remedies. There are many of us here, dubbed "Doctors." We are fond of applause; we are ashamed to appear in the streets at work in a dirty ragged dress, or for aught I know, the balance are like myself, when bread is to be earned, at hard labor, had rather be off, and push in somebody else, however I have been compelled to work, and expect at the age of about forty to learn a mechanical trade. I have a large family to support, and dependant upon my exertions for bread, and instead of earning considerably over one hundred dollars per month for my services, which I did do on an average the year before, I embraced the gospel of the Son of God, which the world derides, and in the zeal of their mastery, have waged an eternal war of persecution, falsely calling it, (as old Rome did,) contending for the kingdom of Christ.

There is a pattern given the servant of God, by obedience to which, they may receive the blessings of God, by obedience to which, they may receive the blessing of God, and the Lord will through them, heal the sick, cure all manner of diseases, for practicing those ordinances, we incur the displeasure of "Mystic Babylon," on every side they let fly the shafts of their satire, mock and abuse, whip and torture. I have administered to many by authority of the Holy Priesthood. I thank God my expectations, have been fully realized. I have witnessed cases where the most signal relief was experienced, though obedience to the ordinances appointed by Heaven's King. The most excruciating pains removed, fevers of high excitement abated suddenly, children subdued, and fits ceased to convulse. Thus am I more and more established in the gospel of Jesus Christ, being the power of God unto salvation to all them that believe; but we cannot at all times exercise faith. We all came here with more or less prejudice, and the traditions of the fathers. Some of every class, (as we have various circles of what the world calls society) Doctors as well as other people I claim nothing higher than the common rank, although I have undertaken the task that I generally considered belonged to the first order or rank. Small men, you know however, are seldom noticed among great folks, unless they happen to be blessed with a thundering voice, or do something smart; as occasionally to imitate the frog (only stop a little short) that attempted to outvie the ox. Men's notions and views of things are often very erroneous, and if they do not make them known, there is but little hopes of discovering it. The common idea in the world when a Mormon is spoken of, something unnatural is expected to be discovered in his features, at least when he is seen. And so with some that are called latter day saints, with regard to the authorities of the church particularly the Prophet. The least foible of his, is calculated to make some deny the faith. He must not eat or drink, or wear, or ride as other men—drat transformation. Wonderful indeed. Some great thing is done. Representations equal to that of the "Moon" in labor, and lo, a mouse is produced. Forget the Prophet is a man of like passions with ourselves.

I hope, Mr. Editor, I shall not weary your patience with spinning preliminaries. You know I am a kind of eccentric being any how. However, in due time, I will arrive at the subject, and shall offer my views, and experience, as to the pathology, symptoms, and treatment of certain forms of disease that prevailed here during the past season, so far as came under my observation. I offer them without the expectation or hope of receiving reward, but with a hope that they may be of service to those, who may consider them worthy of investigation. I have not made any calculation to prosecute the practice since I came here, knowing that the common ravage course of practice was not approved by the authorities of the church. It may not be expected therefore, that I shall pay much attention to technical phrases but use "great plainness of speech." I feel fully warranted in offering my views in the present case, from my success and experience in practice heretofore; and the learned disciple of "Esculapius" may draw the contrast, if he should not consider it descending below his dignity to do so. But wisdom is justified of all her children.

A Dutchman who on a time was a member of a certain Legislative body, figured wonderfully indeed. When the session came to a close he returned to his constituents in triumph. They flocked around him to hear the news. The question was propounded, "what did you do in the Legislature?" "I did not stay and loogt werry wise." "But what was done in the Legislature?" "Well I ut not a vat to rest tididoo, put I did make three hunter toller."

I know, sir, there is a manifest error in the treatment of diseases, by many wise physicians, as their theory of disease was obtained in a different climate from that in which their labors are afterwards postponed. This is something like a military officer training his Regiment under Scott's discipline, and by an act of Assembly be compelled to train by M. Combs's discipline. There is considerable of medicine administered here, that does not seem to be of much benefit, and knowing there must be a cause for it, I came to the conclusion that in all probability it was that most of our pill-drivers, obtained our book knowledge from eastern writers. I know that the most celebrated practitioners of the eastern States, for diseases particularly fevers, from those of southern practitioners. Although the diseases are classed under the same head and called by the same name. In view of this fact, as my theatre of action has been confined to the south-western climate, I think there can be no harm resulting from an investigation of this subject, and peradventure some new idea may be suggested to the mind of some, who design to continue practice here. I was ever sensible of the responsibility of my calling, and that I ought to be better prepared, or qualified to discharge the various duties devolving upon me. I did not spare either labor or expense, to acquire a correct knowledge of my profession. I subscribed for and read the best journals in the United States, published on the science, and practice of medicine. I sought every opportunity to consult men of the choicest medical attainments, on various diseases, when not otherwise engaged, and in every very difficult case, I would call in the best services I could obtain.

I do not wish to be understood as attaching the least blame to any practitioner, whatever, but on a fair enquiry into the foregoing remarks, I presume several simple facts will appear; besides, many practitioners now seem to be determined to take their own course in every case they are called to, without calling a consultation. It is written that in the multitude of counsel there is safety. However, some men are ambitious of their honor in this matter. If the friends propose a consultation they object, being as appears the facts, unwilling to have their course of practice investigated. Willing to take all the responsibility on themselves. This is a kind of principle I hope never to possess.

I shall now proceed according to my intention in the outset. As my residence here among the saints has only been fixed for one season preceding my observation and experience is as a matter of course some limited. There is a little difference in the symptoms of the same form of fever, when minutely examined here, and in Tennessee; but the same remedies with slight variations will accomplish a cure. There was a certain form of fever prevailing here the past season, that to southern practitioners, is known as an Algid intermittent, according to its pathology; but commonly called "contagious fever." Its attack is irregular and insidious. Commencing at the extremities with its chilling influence, it extends over the whole surface of the body (except about the epigastrium which continues hot. In severe attacks in the south this chilling influence pervades the entire surface, while yet there is hope of recovery, if the proper remedies are resorted to, (reducing its temperature much below the natural standard. Its prevailing characteristic is the protraction of the cold stage. The hot stage so much experienced in common fevers, succeeded by sweating is only partially developed. In its stead there is much oppression. Great internal heat, inordinate thirst, a sense of weight about the epigastrium, in sickness of the stomach and vomiting. Great restlessness, the patient sometimes rolling from side to side of the bed. Quick feeble pulse, varying much in velocity, in different stages of the disease, and also, there is sometimes spasmodic affections present. This disease when neglected or mis-treated often ends the patient's existence in a short time. It not unfrequently passes into the typhus but the remedy in the present form, is the cold douche, which consists simply of pouring on 15 or 20 gallons of the coldest water on the bare body; after which the patient is to be wiped dry, clothed, and returned to bed; covered well, and permitted to rest. If there has been a sufficiency of water poured on reaction will soon be established, and refreshing sleep will be enjoyed, and the pores of the skin no longer dry and parched, will now act their part in throwing off disease, and a most salutary sweat will ensue. After which but little else is required to complete a cure, than tonics, stimulants, and gentle laxatives, as necessary, with proper care; but should the unpleasant symptoms return after the effusion repeat the operation, and proceed as before. I have frequently had my patients exclaim while under the operation, "pour out! pour out! I never experienced so much relief from any thing in my life." Others who did not seem to be capable of exercising any one of the five senses, have been watched as it were from the very jaws of death, by the operation of this powerful stimulating remedial agent.

Has that never witnessed the salutary effects of cold water in this form of disease, would be as much gratified as surprised to see its benign influence over such a state of the system. When the case assumes a typhoid character the great object is to restore the secretions which are arranged for this purpose, the remedies are gentle laxatives, combined with opiate diaphoretics, and tonics with stimulants, sufficient to reinvigorate the circulation, and restore the various secretions which is so desirable at this stage of the disease, with plenty of light nutritious diet, as soups and rice. I have been greatly surprised to see persons dying from exhaustion for want of sustenance, food and stimulants, and yet for no (as I was informed) by the attending physician to use them at all. What a wonderful understanding, and powerful discernment a man must be in possession of to think of starving out a fever of this type.

Another form of this disease is that the spinal nerves become disordered, attended with neuralgic pains of the side, breast, scalp and limbs. These generally yield to local stimulating applications, to the region of the diseased ganglion, which point is easily discovered, by pressure made on, or heat applied to the spine. The liver is sometimes affected, if there is want of ventilation on that organ, diarrhoea frequently ensues, with other symptoms which any scientific physician will readily be able to combat successfully. However the liver is not as often disordered as most of physicians declare is the case. Some physicians always find the liver disordered in every case of fever, when in reality the liver performs its natural functions, without disturbance. Yet they go to work to remedy a supposed evil and actually produce serious injury. So much for fashionable notions, and tradition. Foolishly supposing that the liver is the only organ which suffers derangement in febrile diseases, to the exclusion of all others. Some Anatomists say that the amount of bile secreted on the liver of a healthy grown person in twenty-four hours, is from four to six ounces, and that it acts as a natural purger, consequently when diseased, may be easily discovered by the disordered state of the stomach and bowels.

There is one other form of this disease that prevails some particular seasons. Green mucous purgings from the bowels, accompanied with coldness of the surface, great pulmonary oppression, weak quick pulse, dry brown tongue, with black hemorrhagic gums. Such a state of the system is much to be dreaded. The remedies which are employed in this disease to advantage, are mild cathartics as calomel and rhubarb, with the nitre mercurial acid bath, to better the extremities; and sponges, the region of the liver, once or twice a day as required, and apply sinapisms of mustard seed, the whole length of the spine.

I have already transcended my intended limits, yet I feel a disposition to notice one other disease before I come to a close. It is a disease of common occurrence; but its management little understood. Deficient females are quite subject to its attacks. It is induced by atmospheric vicissitudes, sudden transitions from a bed room to the chilling air, over exertion, &c., &c. The symptoms are headache, disordered stomach and bowels, as dizziness, and pyrosis, pain in the breast and side, palpitations of the heart, constriction round the waist, so that it is very disagreeable to keep the clothes tied tight, and flatulence. In this case food is frequently ejected from the stomach with loud belchings. It may not be expected that all those symptoms will be present in any one case, but they are certain evidences of the existence of epinal irritation, most generally connected with functional derangement, as anasarca, ludonhea, &c. In this disease it is of the greatest importance for the patient to be temperate in all things, eating, sleeping, recreations and exercise.

The remedies are mild cathartics, diaphoretics, antacids, and tonics, as the preparations of iron in wine, and the steel pill, in conjunction with local applications to the region of the diseased wives.

or scuffling, and cupping, blisters, the tartar ointment, and such like counter irritants as will produce a determination to the skin. Time and space are both exhausted. I must close, with a hope that if you think this hastily written communication worthy of a place in your extensively circulated paper, that it may be of value to many and prevent much suffering.

With sentiments of high esteem Yours,

A. YOUNG.

We received this communication in the daily Messenger. Nauvoo was never in a more healthy state than at present, as may be seen from a reference to our weekly list of deaths. Eo.

A SHOWER OF FLESH AND BLOOD.

In 1841, accounts were published in the newspapers of two showers of flesh and blood—one in Tennessee, and the other in Massachusetts. A correspondent of the South Carolina, writing from Union District, S. C. under date of the 30th ult., who signs himself L. M. Davis, gives the following account of a similar occurrence which lately took place in that State: "On Saturday last, whilst Mr. Wm. M. Inlow and his two sons were picking cotton on his plantation, (in Laurens District, near the river and about two miles below Murgatta's Mill,) the younger son called to the others, who were a little distance from him, to listen, for he heard something falling near him. They thought he was mistaken, and paid but little attention to it; but he insisted, and told them if they would come, he would show it to them on the ground. They went and found the ground strewed with what appeared to them to be pieces of flesh, varying from the size of an ounce, all to larger than a hen's egg. These pieces were very moist, and as red as blood, or any thing else could make them; and the gnat, cotton, or whatever they came in contact with, was stained as with blood. They were scattered several feet apart, over a space of ground some twenty or thirty yards in width; and they examined it for something like fifty yards in length, but did not go to the end of it.

I was informed of it yesterday, and went in company with two gentlemen, to visit the place in person. We were so lucky as to find some of the articles still remaining, and all agree that it had the appearance of flesh, of the finest mould, much finer than we had ever seen before. Some of the pieces seemed to be entirely fat, but most of them, very red, and some what transparent when held up toward the light, but it was considerably dried when I saw it, having lain twenty-four hours.

The younger Wm. Inlow, a very intelligent and credible youth of fourteen, says he first heard a few scattering pieces fall, and looking up, saw the air darkened with them; and that it looked something like snow falling slowly, when the flakes are far apart; but that the pieces fell more rapidly. The shower fell about the middle of the day, while the sun was shining, and a few light clouds were in the atmosphere; but nothing visible could be assigned as the cause of the phenomenon."

SINGULAR PHENOMENON.

Mr. James Allington Bennett has written an interesting and curious letter to the Commercial Advertiser respecting several meteors he has noted during the last year. Respecting the first he says:

"Being near the sea shore some years ago, in the month of August, I observed a bright meteor ascending right in front of me, almost in a perpendicular line, and not, to appearance, three rods distant, and being between me and the sea it maintained its light until it almost touched the ground. A light shock instantly struck my eye as though something had fallen. I approached the spot, but there being only star light could see nothing. On feeling on the ground, however, I stuck my finger into something soft, which I found to have a most peculiar fetid smell, like something I had never met with in the laboratory or any where else. Next morning I examined the place and found about two pounds of brown jelly, which had descended in globular form, but had been broken by the fall and formed a small segment of a sphere. Having no means of either weighing or analysing this matter, I passed it by with the conjecture that it was the substance which forms these meteors or falling stars. The altitude of this meteor could not be more than one hundred yards."

The next fall in the path of his milk-maid, depositing the same kind of jelly without her, depositing its fall. The only effect of the shock was to throw the pail a little on one side.

The third that presented itself was about the latter end of July, last year. Having gone toward the sun between 11 and 12 o'clock, of a very clear night, I noticed all of a sudden that the east end of the coach-house presented a brilliant light, and turning to look for the cause, a most splendid meteor, which had run nearly half its course, leaving a brilliant streak of light after it, was descending directly toward me, on an angle of about 45 degrees, when it immediately ceased to shine. "There goes another jelly," said I to myself, "which I must hunt up in the morning."

Mr. Bennett marked the spot where it fell, and next morning proceeded with a lad to find it. It had fallen farther off than he expected, and he says:

I passed four fields without success, when at the lower end of the fifth field, a piece of dead wood, fell half a mile from where I stood, to my wonder and admiration I discovered a little on the right of the line of each, a body of dark brown jelly, exactly like one side of a convex lens, three feet in diameter, but broken into many pieces by the fall. The stench was most insupportable. This body of jelly before it fell must have formed a globe of from ten to twelve inches in diameter, if not more. This jelly, which lay on the spot where it fell until the 12th of September following, entirely destroyed all the grass under and near it. Now I think that taking the base line of a right angle triangle at double the distance from where I stood, and this meteor having its formation at the head of the perpendicular, its altitude must be counted at least one mile, as its downward course would trace the hypotenuse of the same triangle for some distance.

There is a possibility of this meteor, having had its origin much higher in the atmosphere than has been supposed, as it is very probable that it was very great, but as I heard no explosion by which the true distance and altitude might have been determined, the elevation of one mile is but a hypothesis. The meteor of the 18th August, 1763, described by Mr. Cavell, in the Philosophical Transactions of London for 1764, he places by a very accurate and certain data, at a distance from the earth of 30 1/2 miles, and pretends to have heard the explosion twelve minutes after, at 130 miles distance.

May not each of these pillars be the residuum of a syncretical relic of the combustion or discharge of a large portion of gases, through electrical agents? The universal downward tendency of their motion shows that their specific gravity is much more than that of the atmosphere, and that they therefore must be formed at the moment of discharge.

The editor put directly after this account of the shower of flesh and blood that fell lately in South Carolina, and says perhaps Mr. E. theory will explain it. There may be something in this; and the two substances noticed in each case may result from the same cause, and that so often laughed at under the name of a shower of flesh and blood be a very philosophical and true thing after all.

But Mr. B. is mistaken in calling them meteors in the common acceptation of that term; we have no hesitation in saying. These fiery masses that pass so rapidly through the air, accompanied often with loud detonations and throwing off fragments that reach the earth, are something entirely different. Those fragments are some and are hurled so violently as to be embedded in the soil. This meteor described by Mr. Cavell, in 1763, and to which Mr. Bennett refers, we take to be an entirely different thing from ordinary shooting stars. That it has a great altitude is also highly probable, for some of them most certainly have. The heavens which they have frequently hurried to the earth, would have effectually demolished, we think, the matter in 14 pad. The substance of the meteoric showers, so called, no one pretends to know. They are supposed, however, to be entirely different from the ordinary shooting stars.

The falling star that anyone may see of a clear night, has long been regarded by philosophers as a gelatinous matter, inflated with phosphoreted hydrogen gas; and the splendid meteor of Mr. Bennett was doubtless one of these ordinary shooting stars appearing very bright by its proximity. The gelatinous substance he found, accords with the experience and theory of others, and indeed is a very singular and curious combination of them.

That these substances must be formed at the moment of discharge, we do not think necessary. Their ascent and descent would depend entirely on the amount of gas they contain. The idea of accounting for the shower of flesh and blood on this theory is certainly new, but, and deserves, we think a second thought. We think the following scriptures will explain it more scripturally, if not more philosophically.

And there shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars, and upon the earth, distress of nations with perplexity; Luke XXI. 25.

And I will show wonders in the heavens, and in the earth, blood and fire, and pillars of smoke. The sun shall be turned into darkness, and the moon into blood, before the great and terrible day of the Lord shall come; Joel II. 30, 31.—Ed.

Agricultural.

Mississippi Hemp.—We received on Tuesday morning by the steamer Missouri, a bundle of an excellent hemp was ever grown in any country, raised by Mr. W. P. Warfield, of Batchelor's Bend, in this State. As will be seen by the annexed letter, the yield is fine, and there is no mistake as to the quality, which is as heavy, strong-lined and fine as we ever saw. Mr. Warfield is one of the most experienced and systematic planters in the south. He is, we believe, the first person who has demonstrated the susceptibility of our soil and climate to the growth of this valuable staple of the west.—Free Trader.

Batchelor's Bend, Washington County, Mississippi, December 14th, 1842.

Dear Sir:—Accompanying this note I send you a specimen of hemp grown in Batchelor's Bend, it is water rotted. You will perceive that the lint is heavy and very strong; the boy who broke it is an experienced Kentucky hemp-breaker. He says he never broke heavier lint.

You remember that my anticipation were very sanguine, whilst my little crop of hemp was in progress of growth. I now assure you, that they have been more than realized, both in the quantity and quality. I have a quantity in process of dew rot, (the manner in which it is chiefly rotted in Kentucky,) and when broken out I will send you a specimen. I will have the ground on which it grew, accurately measured and the hemp weighed, and give you the quantity grown on an acre. I will venture to guess from the size of the stalks, that it will yield from 800 to 1000 lbs. per acre, which is considered in Kentucky a good crop. I am so well satisfied with the result of my experience, that I will extend its culture considerably the next year. I promised to let you know the quantity of corn I made per acre this season. Mr. F. H. my overseer, measured what I supposed an average acre, and the result, 50 bushels.

Very respectfully yours,
W. P. WARFIELD.

Paris Academy of Sciences.—In the journal of the Paris correspondent of the National Intelligencer of the 18th ultimo, we find that the learned SAVANS of the Paris Academy of Sciences have determined that the culture of Indian corn, for the manufacture of sugar possesses numerous advantages over the beet root. The setting of this point by a body of men so eminent in scientific attainments, will go far to accelerate the fabrication of sugar from corn, and as a necessary consequence, impart new interest and value to its culture, as the development of this new channel of consumption cannot fail to exercise a happy influence upon prices, and particularly so, as it is stated that an acre will yield 1,000 pounds of sugar of good quality, besides a corresponding large quantity of molasses, as well as abundance of residuum, of the very best character of feed for cattle. With such results, and the highly favorable nature of our climate and soils for the production of corn, we infer that the day is not far distant when new encouragements will be imparted to animate the spirits, and nerve the arm of our enterprising corn-growers.—American Farmer.

REMAINDER in the Post Office at Nauvoo, Illinois, on the 1st of January, 1844, which it not taken out before the 1st of April next, will be sent to the Post Office Department, as dead letters.

A FARM FOR SALE.

CONSISTING of four hundred and eighty acres, 160 acres of which being good timber. It is situated in the half-breed tract, Lee county Iowa Territory, one mile north of Montrose, and one half mile from the river opposite Nauvoo. One hundred and fifteen acres are under improvement; there is a one story frame dwelling, a well and stable on the premises. The above farm will be sold cheap, terms easy. For information call at the office of C. L. Higbee, Esq., or at my residence on the above mentioned tract.

P. S. Missouri land will be taken in exchange for the above farm, by applying soon.

Dec. 20, 1843. no34-1f.

NOTICE.

THE subscriber wishes to inform the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity, that he has just received a splendid assortment of Sole and Upper Leather, Linings, Bindings, &c., also an assortment of Shoemakers Findings, consisting of Pegs, Nails, Threads, Bristles, Aulas, Heel balls &c. The above articles will be sold cheap for cash, hides, or country produce. Those wishing to purchase will please call at the leather store of the subscriber on Mulholland street one quarter of a mile east of the Temple.

Sole-leather sold from 25 to 27 cents per lb.

Dec. 20, 1843. no34-3m.

THE ONE PRICE STORE.

THE subscribers, from the East, have just opened a large assortment of Dry Goods and Groceries, in President Joseph Smith's store, which they offer for sale on as good terms as can be bought in this city; among which is a large assortment of Domestic, Muslins, of a superior quality, also Unbleached Sewing Thread of a very superior article; Blue Knitting Cotton, and a good assortment of Boston Nails, first quality; together with many other articles usually kept in such a store. As we wish to deal honestly with all men, we shall invariably have but one price. Cash and all kinds of country produce taken in exchange, except promises.

BUTLER & LEWIS.

Nauvoo, Dec. 19, 1843. no34-1f.

NOTICE TO EMIGRANTS AND LATTER-DAY SAINTS GENERALLY.

I feel it my duty to say to the brethren generally, and especially those who are emigrating to this place, that there is in the hands of the Trustees in Trust, a large quantity of lands, both in the city and adjoining Townships in this county, which is for sale—some of which belongs to the church and is designed for the benefit of the poor, and also to liquidate debts owing by the church, for which the Trustees in Trust is responsible. Some also is land which has been consecrated for the building of the Temple, and some for the Nauvoo House.

If the brethren who move in here and want an inheritance will buy their lands from the Trustees in Trust, they will thereby benefit the poor, the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and even then only be doing that which is their duty and which I know, by considerable experience, will be vastly for their benefit and satisfaction in days to come. Let all the brethren therefore, when they move into Nauvoo, consult President Joseph Smith the Trustees &c., and purchase their lands of him, and I am bold to say that God will bless them and will hereafter be glad they did so.

We hold ourselves ready at any time to wait upon the brethren and show them the lands belonging to the church and Temple &c., and can be found any day either at President Joseph Smith's Parlor Room or the Temple Recorder's Office, at the Temple.

W. CLAYTON, Clerk.

ABOUT six weeks ago a company of saints arrived in this place escorted by Elder Wandal who had in his charge a trunk belonging to Jane Elizabeth Manning—Sister Manning was not here then but has since arrived and can obtain no intelligence of her trunk; it is presumed that some one has got it in mistake as there was a number of passengers arrived at the same time. The trunk is about three feet long and covered with a lighted hair skin, with the exception of the back, on which there is some white. It is directed Jane Elizabeth Manning, Nauvoo. Whoever will give such information as shall lead to the discovery of the trunk will be handsomely rewarded by applying to this office.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan?

Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr James M. Martien!

Inquire for Dr James M. Martien's Invaluable remedy for the cure of Fevers.

For Dr James M. Martien's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.

For Dr James M. Martien's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills.

For Dr James M. Martien's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.

For Dr James M. Martien's Cephalic Snuff, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that, in their curative virtues may be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having reached riper years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr James M. Martien is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fondest expectations; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by all future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPHOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

FATTENING TURKEYS.

On looking over some old papers a few days ago, we came across the following curious mode of fattening turkeys:

"In the winter of 1818-19, a gentleman in this city made the following experiment: He placed a turkey in an enclosure about four feet long, two feet wide, and three or four feet high. He excluded as much light as he could without preventing a circulation of air, and fed the turkey with soft bricks broken into pieces, with charcoal also broken, and with six grains of corn per day. Fresh water was daily supplied. The turkey or crop in which the turkey was placed he always locked up with his own hands, and is perfectly confident that nobody interfered with the experiment."

"At the end of one month he invited a number of his neighbors, among others, two physicians. The turkey, now very large and heavy, was killed and opened by the physicians, and was found to be filled up with fat. The gizzard and entrails were diseased, and nothing was found but a residuum of charcoal and brick. To conclude the examination satisfactorily, the turkey was eaten, and found to be very good. Last winter he again repeated the experiment with the same success."

The circumstance which induced him to make the experiment is a very curious one. One of his neighbors informed him that being driven from the city by the fever of 1793, his family recollected that some fowls that had lived in a kind of loft over his workshop, had been forgotten in the hurry of their removal, and would certainly be starved. They were absent six or eight weeks, and on their return the pestilence returned. To their great astonishment, the fowls were not only alive, but very fat, although there was nothing but charcoal and shavings that they could have eaten, and some water that had been left in the trough of a grindstone had supplied them with drink."

Peacock's Pickle for Meat.—Admiral Peacock's pickle for meat is preferable to most others when applied to fowls, beef, pork or mutton. It is thus made:—Water, 4 gallons; sugar (or molasses), 1 1/2 lb.; saltpetre, 2 ounces; salt (the way or largest sort), 6 pounds. Boil all together and skim. Then let it cool. The meat being placed in a vessel intended to hold it, pour the cold pickle on the meat till it is covered. In that state keep it for family use. The beef, after lying in the pickle for ten weeks, has been found as good as if it had been salted three days, and as tender as a chicken. If the meat is to be preserved for a considerable time, the pickle must be boiled and skimmed once in two months, throwing during the boiling two runces of sugar, and a half pound of salt. Thus the same pickle is incomparable for corned hams, tongues, and hung beef. When tongues and hung beef are taken out of the pickle, cleanse and dry the pieces, then put them in paper bags, and hang them in a dry, warm place. Some who have tried the method choose their meat salted, and instead of 6, use 8 or 9 pounds of salt. In very hot weather it is necessary before the meat is put in the pickle, to rub it well over with salt and let it lie one, two, or three hours, till the bloody juices run off. If the meat, in this case, is the least tainted before it is put in the pickle, it will be entirely spoiled in a day's time, in hot weather. Peacock's pickle is found so valuable, that no family ought to be without it.—Farmer's Gazette.

Frozen Potatoes.—Many suppose potatoes that have once been thoroughly frozen, are therefore rendered unfit for use. This is perhaps true where they have been permitted to thaw; but potatoes are but little injured by freezing for culinary purposes, and if thrown at once into a kettle of boiling water, while the frost is in them, they will be found equally as nutritious and palatable as those that have not been frozen. It is the freezing and thawing that deteriorates their eating properties, and renders them always more or less strong, and unfit for food. We have known families whose houses, in new settlements were not provided with cellars, suffer their potatoes to remain frozen for weeks; and the same process is often pursued by loggers without but, in any whatever to the roots. The more constantly however, they are kept frozen, the better and more palatable they will be.—Maine Cultivator.

Corn Cobs.—The most economical method of disposing of corn cobs, is doubtless to pound them up and grind them with corn, for stock. But as this is often neglected, another excellent mode of disposal is to soak them in pickle and feed them to cows or other cattle in the yard. A large tub, formed by sawing a hogshead in two, near the middle, should be placed in a convenient place near the yard, and being filled with cobs, a sufficiency of warm water, strongly impregnated with common salt, should be poured over them to render them soft and palatable to the stock.

Most animals devour them greedily in this state, but when it is not too much trouble, grinding into meal is much preferable. There is but little difference in the value of pure corn meal, and that made of corn and cobs, for feeding most animals. The meal of the cob also makes excellent puddings.—Maine Cultivator.

Acid in Wood.—It has been remarked by those who are in the habit of packing butter, that it kept best put down in stone; the next best is oak or white ash firkins, the wood of which had been boiled for several hours previous to working; and that butter packed in firkins of unprepared wood frequently acquires a strong and disagreeable flavor which seriously injures it. The reason of this has not been generally understood. Mr. Moir of Scotland has been instituting a series of experiments on the subject, which appear to have thrown some light on the matter. He found that most kind of wood contained considerable quantities of pyrogenic acid, which decomposes the salt with which it comes in contact. The Linton or Basswood was the only wood he found entirely free, but the other kinds he experimented upon, were easily freed from the acid by boiling three or four hours, well pressed under water. It is evident that firkins made of staves prepared in this way would be decidedly improved, and as the preservation of butter in a sweet and pure state is an important matter to the dairy man, we think much would be gained by a proper attention to vessels in which it is packed.—[Sat. Cour.]

Hams.—The best method of preserving hams from the injury they receive from bugs, during the summer, is to find from experience to be the middle of February or the first of March, hams should be taken down and after a careful inspection if no bugs are seen, put on the fleshy part of them a thick sprinkling of salt, then place them on a square of domestic homespun, and carefully fold in every part to suit the shape of the hams, and sew them up closely, so as to leave no aperture for the bugs to make their entrance, and suffer them to be exposed to the sun, several hours after they have been bagged, before they are hung up, and then the first damp weather strike them. If there should be any bugs visible, they should be scraped off and ascertain whether they have penetrated the hams, and deposited their eggs or not, for should they have done so, it will be unnecessary trouble to bag them at all, as no precaution will then save them—but if taken in hand in February or the first of March, the bug will at that early period scarcely have made its appearance; and large and finely flavored hams may be saved perfectly sound for two years at least.

Cure for Bots.—A writer in the Columbia Planter gives the following remedy for bots: As soon as symptoms of bots appear, raise the upper lip of the horse and with the sharp point of a knife scratch the inner coat of the lip [beginning at the top] making a number of slight gashes, transversely, causing it to bleed slightly. A cure has never come under my observation (and I have cured many) in which this simple mode of treatment did not succeed instantly. The most violent paroxysms will be relieved in five minutes. What connexion or sympathy there may be between the lip and maw, I leave to the curious and learned to decide.

We give an article to-day on milking cows. It is from a paper printed far Northward, and may seem singular to our readers, as it speaks of men milking. To us the custom appeared even ridiculous when we first saw it. We happened to be travelling in New Connecticut—and putting up at the house of a Presbyterian preacher; it was a cold winter evening, we were not a little amused to see him to up his head, hang his bucket on his arm, and saunter forth to milk his twenty cows. But with the Yankee, this is the universal custom, we believe. Having no servants, the men relieve their wives of all the laborious drudgery of the dairy. The custom seemed very tame; but at the same time, it showed affection. Any good husband ought to be willing to milk the cows for his wife.

Making Cows.—The owners of cows should pay particular attention to milking. Children should not be trusted with this business, and there are many grown people who never milk well, though they have been brought up to the business.

If you would obtain all the milk from the cow you must treat her with the utmost gentleness; she must not startle or tremble under your blows nor under your threats. She may at times need a little chastisement, but at such times you need not expect all her milk.

Soon after the bag has been brushed by your hand, and the ends of the teats have been moistened a little with milk, it flows in rapidly and all the veins or ducts near the teats are completely filled. Then it must be drawn out immediately, or you will not get the whole. You must not sit and talk; you must not delay a moment if you would have all the milk is then ready to yield.

The udder should be moved in every direction at the close of milking, and the hands may beat it a little in imitation of the beating which the calf gives it when he is sucking. An expert milker will make the cow give one quarter more in butter than a majority of grown milkers will.

One season, at Framingham, we kept four cows in the home lot; there was but little difference in the quantity of milk given by each. We had a very steady strain of 40 years of age; he had carried on a farm in New Hampshire and had always been used in milking; but he was so slow the cows had no patience with him.

We milked two of the cows, and he the other two, and we were but little more than half as long as he in milking, though we got the largest mess by one quart. On our remonstrating that he did not draw out all the milk, he said his cows would not yield so much as those milked by us. We then made an exchange; he milked our two and we milked his. In three weeks time the case was reversed; our messes exceeded his by nearly one quart. He never failed to strip his cows to the last drop; but his intolerable slowness was the worst of his faults. What an active milker would have done!

Young learners may practise on cows that are to be soon dried off. They should be taught at first how to take hold of the teats and they will remember it; but how common it is to let each child choose his own mode of milking! Learners should know that the hand should be kept very near the extremity of the teat, if they would milk with ease. The left arm should always press gently against the leg of the cow; for if she is inclined to kick she cannot, with any force; she cannot strike an object that is against her, but if she raises up her foot, as she often will when her teats are sore, the milker will be ready to ward off and keep it from the pail much better than when he sits far off from the cow.

If hunters are made tame and gentle by frequent handling when they are young they are not apt to kick the milker; their udders should be rubbed gently before milking, it is quite as grateful to them as yarding. But if they are suffered to run wild till after they have calved they cannot be expected to be gentle when you first attempt to milk them; they often acquire bad habits and are not broken of them through life.

[Correspondence of the New York Tribune.]
PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 10.—P. M.
There is considerable excitement among the friends of Ireland and Repeal, in Philadelphia, arising out of the recent arrest of Daniel O'Connell and co-laborers in the good cause. The two associations have each held large and enthusiastic meetings, at which measures of a strong character were adopted.

A bond was read and signed by eleven men of property and standing, pledging themselves, in the event of a struggle between the people of Ireland and the British Government to the payment of $1,000 each, to aid and assist the former; and checks for the same were placed in the hands of Myles D. Sweeney, Capt. Nowland, of the brig—, handed in $5, and proffered the services of his vessel in case of need, to carry Yankee Norrons to Ireland.

Shut the Door.—The Baltimore Sun thinks it is imperative on every one to shut the door after them. We think so, too; particularly in cold weather. Read what the Sun says.

Shut the Door.—This injunction is not easily complied with. Shut the door—that's short. True it's imperative; very much so; but it is proper, when necessary. It is anything but a hint, or even a request; in fact it is a command, and one which claims obedience on all occasions, on which it becomes necessary to issue it. Shut the door; yes, shut it. You found it closed when you entered; why then should you leave it open? You have no right to leave it so, and you would do wrong whenever you neglect to do right; that's certainly a correct inference.

Recipe for making Black Ink.—1. M. Leish, of Malden, communicates the following recipe to the Olive Branch.

Two quarts of rain water, one half pound nutgalls, three ounces gum Senegal, (arabic,) three dr. sulphate of iron, soak the nutgalls in three quarters of the water; the gum arabic in one half of the remaining water warmed; the sulphate of iron in the other half; let them stand in the several vessels 48 hours, then mix them, and the ink is made.

This recipe for making the best black ink, was received last winter from Dr. Webster, Professor of Chemistry in Harvard University.

A well dressed young gentleman at a ball, in whisking about the room, ran his head against a young lady. He began to apologise:

"Not a word, sir," said she, "it's no hard enough to hurt any body."

"My Wife," said a critic, "is the most even tempered woman I ever saw; she is always mad."

Earthquake in Assam.—Extract of a letter:—A severe shock of an earthquake was felt at Jooipor, Upper Assam, on the 16th of June last, but did no harm beyond creating considerable alarm amongst all classes. This is the third shock we have had since the first of January, and by far the most severe.

Good Yield.—Five and three quarters tons of carrots, which sold in Lowell market for $10 per ton, were raised this season by Mr. Joseph S. Farmer, of Tewksbury, on about 60 rods of land. The carrot is one of our most wholesome vegetables, and for much cause is thought by many farmers superior to the Ruta Baga or the turnep.

A few days ago an examination was made at Mobile, of the body of a Mrs. Murphy, supposed to have been killed by her husband. In one week after the examination, the husband himself died, and so the matter is now all buried, and the question of the husband's guilt or innocence is known only to the Supreme Judge.

At Cumberland Lodge, in Windsor Park, England, there is a celebrated vine, which is forty years old. It is supposed to be the largest in the world. It now contains 2,350 bunches of grapes each averaging one pound weight. Its length is 135 feet, width 10, and it extends over a space of 2,200 feet.

Earthquakes.—The Journal of Commerce gives a letter from Ragusa, in Dalmatia, describing a succession of earthquakes which occurred there in August, two on the 16th, one or more every day till the 23d; a violent one on the 24th; another on the 25th, and on the 26th one of such extreme severity that the inhabitants fled in terror. The houses were so much shattered that it was feared another shock would overwhelm them all in ruin.

Singular Lake.—The Houston Telegraph says there is in Jefferson county, Texas, near Beaumont, a lake, the sides of which are bitumen. It is about a quarter of a mile in circumference. In the winter months, its surface is hard and capable of sustaining a person. It is generally covered, from November to March, with water that is sour to the taste. Owing to this, it is called by the people in the vicinity, the Sour Lake. In the summer, there is a spring near the middle, where an oily liquid (probably petroleum) continually boils up from the bottom. This liquid gradually hardens after being exposed to the air, and forms a black, pitchy substance, similar to that at the sides of the lake.

Bridge across the Ohio.—Memorials are in circulation in the West, asking Congress to provide for the construction of a wire suspension bridge across the Ohio, at the junction of the National Road with said river. The estimated expense is $130,000. According to the plan designated, there is to be a space of fifty feet between the bridge and the tops of the highest steamboat piers, at an ordinary stage of water, rendering it free from any objection on the ground of obstruction to the navigation.

The Northern Star (Fergus O'Connor's paper) of yesterday thus describes the attitude which the Chartists will assume in reference to the present position of Ireland:—"If Ministers attempt to coerce Ireland, 5,000,000 of English Chartists will remonstrate against this attempt, but they will not again place themselves in the position of being marked as wretches deserving the notice of the Attorney General. No, they have profited by experience, and will perish to a man before they will allow 500,000 of their fighting men to enlist in the despot's ranks.—Edinburgh Review.

Complimentary.—A fellow wrote home to his father as follows:—"You had better come out to Sangamon county, (Ill.) for almighty mean men get office here."

AN INTERESTING WORK.

A New York correspondent of the Charleston Mercury, describing an interview with General Bertrand, learned a fact that will be pleasing to our literary and military Statesmen. It is that he has now in the press a work on the Campaign of Napoleon in Egypt, dictated to him by that great commander whilst he was at St. Helena, a few months before his death, and which goes fully into all the details of that extraordinary movement. It will contain also, Napoleon's views of the politics of the different Governments of Europe during the time.

Junction of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans.—The contract entered into by the Barings, with the republic of New Grenada, for the construction of a ship canal across the Isthmus of Darien, provides for ceding to the company the line for the projected work, with eighty thousand acres of land in the interior. These princely merchants do not appear in this transaction as the agents of the British Government officially, but as British subjects, protected by the Government; and doubtless many advantages will be secured to Great Britain, both political and commercial, by the completion of the vast work here projected. The completion of the ship canal between the two oceans, as projected, will mark an era in the world's age. The event will stand forth to give a distinctive character to the century. It is to be a five years' work—to endure for ever! The whole aspect of will accelerate the revolution now going on in China more rapidly and more thoroughly than all the force of British armaments; and not there only will it work changes, but in all Polynesia and the western coasts of South America, which are now reached by doubling Cape Horn.

FRANCE.

On Sunday, the Cabinet of which Marshal Soult and M. Guizot are the heads completed the third year of its existence—a very protracted one when compared with the duration of the Administrations that preceded it. The King marked his sense of its services by promoting most of the Ministers to the highest rank in the Legion of Honor. It is said that Tuesday, the 26th of December, is the day fixed for the meeting of the Chambers, and that the ordinance of convocation will be published on the 15th inst. The Commerce announces that the superior committee of the fortifications of Paris, in concert with the War-office, is at this moment preparing a statement which is not without importance; it relates to the effective of the troops which are to compose the garrison, and likewise of the armament necessary for the detached forts of the capital. If this statement be true, it appears that the Parisian citadels will occupy in time of peace an army of 24,800 men, which united with the garrison of the military establishments of the continuous walls, as well as those of the interior of Paris, will form an effective of more than 60,000 men to guard the city of Paris, and will be armed with 1262 cannon, composed in part of 80 pounders and mortars, capable of throwing their projectiles into the centre of Paris. In consequence of the increase of troops demanded by the fortifications of Paris, it is also said to be in contemplation to augment the artillery and engineer force, as well as the Municipal Guard. Some of the papers discuss the probable marriage of the Duke d'Aumale to the Princess of Naples, for which purpose his Royal Highness is said to be now journeying through Italy. The Duke and Duchess de Nemours intend to leave Paris this week for England, on a visit to the Queen.

GREECE.

At a late hour on Thursday night we received, by extraordinary express, the following important communication from our correspondent at Athens. The apparent tranquility of that capital having been disturbed by the discovery of an intended attempt at counter-revolution, by General Colocotroni, one of the aids-camp of King Otho, his Majesty, in order to remove all suspicion of his own participation in the design, assembled his Council of State, together with the civil and military authorities, on the 14th of October, and addressed them in these words:—

"Having embraced the constitutional system, which I conscientiously believe to be necessary for the welfare and prosperity of my beloved Greece, I fervently desire that it shall be established with tranquility and good order. I have therefore to beg of you, gentlemen, to make known to all persons in authority under you, to your friends and to your acquaintances, this my irrevocable Royal will, that no one may be deceived as to my desire, and be led away to act in word or deed, against the new system of government."

The subsequent events are thus graphically given by our correspondent:

ATHENS, Oct. 10.—The above most important declaration was made by King Otho to an extraordinary (convoked) Assembly of the Ministers of State and other leading characters in Athens, in consequence of very serious disturbances having taken place in that capital. On the 9th of October General Colocotroni, one of his Majesty's aids-camp, did all in his power to institute a counter-revolution. His attempts, however, to seduce the troops entirely failed. The King pleaded ignorance of any such movement being attempted, and after some hesitation consented to dismiss the obnoxious aid-camp, who was then sentenced by the Government to quit the country forthwith. He decided on embarking in the Austrian packet, which was on the point of sailing for Trieste, but the populace had become so exasperated against him, that on his arriving at the Piræus harbor they attacked the carriage, and would have probably sacrificed him on the spot, had not the coachman lashed his horses into a gallop, and at full speed returned to the capital.

Once more he essayed to reach the harbor with a strong escort of cavalry, but the populace were too determined, and forced them back again. Finally, he succeeded in getting on board the Greek government steamer, by embarking at a distant part of the shore, and reached Syra.

Four days from the above event a very large body of the people prevented M. Rivet, French Ambassador on board the Austrian steamer. On this occasion the military succeeded in dispersing the crowd without causing bloodshed, and M. Rivet was saved from popular vengeance by the French Minister, who conveyed him in his own carriage to the harbor, and there placed him in safety on board the French war steamer Tartare, which conveyed him to Andros.

Since the king's speech on the 14th the capital has remained quiet, and I feel persuaded that if his Majesty will only act with sincerity, and not be led away by designing hangers-on, the Greeks really wish his continuance on the throne, and will cordially lend their support to carrying out the new order of things.

Foreign vessels of war continue to arrive in the Piræus harbor daily. The Marengo, 81, the war steamers Tartare and Lavoisier, the steamer Mentor, and Diligente corvette, have arrived, and two frigates expected, which will make a strong French force. The only English vessels of war at present in port are the Indus and Vespasian.

A French war steamer arrived with despatches this morning from Toulon, and so urgent are the instructions that she returns instantly.—Morning Post.

INDIA.

EXPRESS FROM MARSEILLES.

(From the Times.)
By our monthly courier from Marseilles we have received the intelligence despatched from Bombay on the 2d of October, which reached Marseilles in the afternoon of the 2d instant, in the Alecto steamer. We have Bombay papers to the date of the departure of the mail; advice from Calcutta to the 18th of September, and from China to the 3d of August. The latter, however, add nothing to the news brought direct from Hong Kong to Sue by the Akbar steamer, and which we published in the early part of the last month.

The principal item of intelligence from India is an insurrection at Lahore, and the murder of Shere Singh. The following are extracts from the Delhi Gazette on this subject:—

"This event took place at the north gate of Lahore, about a mile and a half from the palace, at half past nine o'clock on the morning of the 15th. The conspiracy was formed by Fakker Azeez-odd-Deen and Dhyani Singh, and it fell to the lot of Sirdar Ajeet Singh to execute it. Sirdars Gopal Singh, Lala Singh (Majestee), and Soocher Singh were also concerned; Dhyani Singh made the arrangements by proposing to the Maharajah to inspect Ajeet Singh's troops, which the Maharajah said he would do the following morning, and orders were accordingly issued. On the Maharajah's arrival at the parade ground he found fruit with the appearance and condition of some horsemen purposely placed to attract attention, when Ajeet Singh became saucy, words ran high, and drawing a pistol from his honor, but Ajit Singh, not Sher Singh, through the lead, the ball having entered his right temple. General Ventura and his party attacked the murderer, but being opposed by a powerful body of troops were defeated. Ajit Singh cut up the Rajah's body, placed his head on a spear, and on entering the town put Prince Parthab Singh's sash, which was immediately taken, and the Prince killed. The police was taken, and Duple Singh, the only remaining son of Ranjeet Singh, a lad 10 years old, proclaimed to the throne. The treasury was thrown open, and the troops paid up their arrears of pay; every child and all of Sher Singh's and Prince Parthab Singh's wives were then brought out and murdered, among the rest of Sher Singh's sons, only born to the previous evening. Troops were sent off to guard all the ghats and all the opposite party (except Ventura, who escaped) made prisoners.

Ajit Singh after having killed Sher Singh was returning to the fort, and met Duple Singh; he told him he had done the deed, and asked him to return; he got into Duple Singh's carriage, and when they got near the gate of the fort, Ajit Singh stabbed Duple Singh, and sent his body to his brother, Sonel Singh, and his son, Heera Singh. These two individuals surrounded the city with their troops, the people inside continued plundering all night.

In the morning (10th) Heera Singh having entered the fort, and Ajit Singh, Duple Singh, and others, and having put them to death, exposed their heads in the pylon and threw their bodies into the river. Duple Singh has been put on the gallows, and Heera Singh made Viceroy. 600 men were slaughtered on both sides.

Shera Mohammed is said to be in the hills near Candahar. Dost Mohammed, who rules at Cabul, seems desirous of being on friendly terms with the British Government. It is thought he will attempt now to retake Peshawar from the Sikhs, and he may therefore come into collision with the British Government, who are bound to protect Ranjeet Singh's descendants.

The greatest interest is excited in India by the revolution in Lahore, which, it is expected, will terminate in placing that country, with nearly 4,000,000 inhabitants, and a revenue of upwards of £2,000,000 sterling, under the dominion of Great Britain.

In the interior of India tranquility prevails. Gwalior appears quiet for the moment, although there was great alarm created there with the intention of the Supreme Government to collect troops because known. Bundelkand is also quiet, and the British Government is also quiet.

There were some trials of great interest at Bombay, such as that of Dhirkoo Dabbe, the East India Company for trespass in forcibly entering his house, and entering his papers; another trial is of a Parsee lady, who has brought an action against her husband, on his marrying a second wife, to obtain restitution of conjugal rights. An attempt was made to prove the British courts had no right to interfere, but the Supreme Court has maintained its jurisdiction.

Another trial of great interest has been that of two of the principals in the trial of the conspirators of the Bader gang, who were for years been robbing, plundering, smuggling, and as it is expected, may bring up the history of Bombay. The defendant was a gang after it had existed 20 years, is looked upon with great satisfaction by the friends of Indian civilization and justice.

Lord Elphinstone remains at Barrackpore, whence he is expected to proceed soon to the north-western provinces. He is supposed to be a part of the Indian press, but another portion supports his action as tending to produce good results.

Sir Hugh Gough has taken the command of the army.

The monsoon has been eminently favorable to the agricultural products of the country.

TEXAS.

Intelligence from Galveston to the 13th instant, has been received at N. Orleans:

(Private Correspondence)

This is a stormy time with us in Texas, both in the weather and political affairs. The gales have been quite severe on the Gulf and Galveston Bay for the last two weeks; but no damage has been done yet compared to gales of the 19th of last September, which laid Galveston almost desolate. The rains have been tremendous on the coast, but sixty miles from the coast the rains have been very light, and in between.

Those who are at the head of affairs believe we shall soon have the recognition of our independence by Mexico. General Houston has sent Colonel Smith, Mr. Williams and Geo. W. Hockley as commissioners to Laredo on the Rio Grande, to meet commissioners from the City of Mexico, to conclude upon the ratification and peace if possible. The commissioners are men of the first standing in Texas, and men that are well acquainted with the Mexican character, so we have every reason to expect something favorable. If our naval commissioners had obeyed orders last spring, and returned to the city of Galveston as they were often ordered to do, I feel confident that we should have had a permanent peace by this time. The large mass of the people at this time are very hostile to the naval commissioners' conduct, and is an evidence of the fact, the anti-Houston party made it a question, and every man that ran on the ticket supporting Moore and the naval commissioners was defeated, save Dr. Levi Jones, of Galveston, and he was only elected by seven votes majority over Bache.

General Houston will have a large majority in both Houses of Congress; the full returns, however, have not been received, but enough is known to ensure a large administration majority. In this country, where one of the naval commissioners, Col. James Morgan, resides, and who was a candidate for Congress, running on the question of justification of his conduct, the administration candidate received a large majority, which was death to the anti-Houston party; for before the election came off, they were claiming a very large majority. Col. Morgan, after the election was over, made a speech to his supporters, stating that he was glad that he was defeated; that it would show to the people at a distance that we were a law-abiding people; and that it would have a good effect abroad, which I think not very sensible; but it was perfect death to his party—and especially a certain Count, who was one of his strong supporters. Gen. Houston is as popular in Texas now as ever General Washington was in the United States; and if he should succeed in securing a permanent peace, his fame will soar to loft.

The cotton-crop in Texas this season will be very large; the corn crop is the largest we have ever had. Corn can be bought by the quantity at 20 cents per bushel; pork at $1.50 per cwt.; and, in fact, every kind of produce is very cheap and abundant, which is encouraging to emigrants. We expect a large emigration this fall and winter.

The health of Houston has been very good this summer. Our city is still improving. One or two large brick stores are going up, besides some wooden houses.

PORTER ROCKWELL.

Since we wrote the short account of Mr. Rockwell's discharge from Missouri, we have the history of his imprisonment, in publication, which prevents us fulfilling our engagement in publishing it in the paper. We have no doubt but that it will be highly interesting.

DISGRACEFUL AFFAIR AT CARTHAGE.

On Tuesday last, Horace Eldridge, one of our county officers went to Carthage for the purpose of arresting Milton Cook, on the charge of battery, and bringing him before R. D. Foster, justice of the peace of this county, before whom affidavit had been made to that effect. He found the accused in Bartlett's grocery, (Carthage) and arrested him. Cook had a gun that he said he had loaded for the purpose, and would make a hole through the constable if he molested him, and swore he would not be taken. Harman T. Wilson, and others, then stepped forward to his assistance, and said that they had sworn to stand by him, and that he should not go. He then returned with his process to the justice of the peace, and told him what had occurred. Mr. Foster then summoned Eldridge to go along with the constable, and assist in bringing the delinquent. They went on and drove to the grocery where they expected to find him, but he was not there; they then went out for a short time without making known their business, when they saw an armed force gathering. They shortly afterwards returned to the grocery, and saw him there, where he swore he would not be taken—there was also an armed force standing in the door, who also swore he should not be taken. The officer having the process, Mr. Markham, and Mr. Eagle, stepped forward and wished to reason the case with them; the officer, at the same time demanding their assistance; they were met with an armed force of about twenty, four of whom stood in the doorway with guns and bayonets, and two with pistols. The two having the bayonets charged directly at Mr. Markham, and swore they would run him through, and rushed upon him with their bayonets. He however, warding off their blows with his arm, and the bayonet glanced and struck Mr. John Eagle in the abdomen, the bayonet went through his clothes, scratched his body, and glanced off without doing any further injury, other than giving him a slight cut in the hand. These having the pistols then intended to shoot, when Mr. Markham seized the hand of one of them that held the pistol, and prevented him from firing; at the same time Mr. Eagle's breast, and swore he would shoot him. The company at that time used all their force, and crowded the officers, and their assistants some distance back, and carried off and secreted the prisoner. The officer and his company then went to the tavern to stay all night. The next morning about eight o'clock, the constable and Mr. Markham went to the grocery and searched, and Bartlett said that he was gone—that he had taken his horse and gone out of town. They then saw a company of men gathering at Harman T. Wilson's store, arms, wild guns, bayonets, pistols, clubs and other missiles. Mr. Markham went to the store, where he found the constable and the prisoner. There was fifty, in and about the store, all armed. Mr. Eldridge then told the company present, who he was, and demanded all in the house to assist in taking the prisoner, and seized him, as soon as he had hold of the prisoner, about six or eight men laid hold of the constable, and Mr. Markham assisted the constable, when Mr. Markham drew his pistol and shot at Markham; the ball missed Markham; but came so near Mr. Coltrin's head, who was one of the assistants, as to graze his forehead. As there was only four of the assistants, in the store they were overpowered by superior numbers and the prisoner was taken away from them. They saw that it would be impossible to take him without bloodshed, and consequently returned home. The parties engaged in this affair swore that regardless of all law they would defend the prisoner and he should not be taken.

We have received the above particulars from Mr. Markham and can consequently rely upon the correctness of the statement as he is one of the parties mentioned. We are informed that the woman who was charged with the battery, shot in the church, neither is Mr. Eagle, the person who was struck with the bayonet. We understand that Mr. Eagle has gone to the Governor to make complaint.

We think that it is high time that prompt measures be taken to put a stop to such atrocious outrages. If officers can be treated in this manner and the law violated with impunity, we think that we shall speedily slide back into the barbarous ages. Some of our mobocratic friends, who assembled at a mobocratic meeting some time ago in Carthage were considerably chagrined at our terming these mobocrats, we wonder whether they now believe that they are or not? If such proceedings as these are cherished, far well to our republican institutions; far well to our equity and justice, and far well to all those sacred rights that bind men to their fellow men.

We would herewith warn the sheriff why he was not applied to. We merely ask for information; we don't know that he was present or applied to. If he was it certainly was his duty to see the law magnified.

RECIPES.

A complete cure for a terrible disorder of the mouth commonly called "Scandal." Take of good nature, one ounce; of an herb called by the Mormons, "mind your own business," one ounce, to which add of the oil of horehound, one drachm and of brotherly love, two ounces. You must mix the preceding ingredients with a little charity for others, and a few sprigs of keep your tongue between your teeth. Let this compound be allowed to simmer for a short time in a vessel called circum-spection, and it will be ready for use.

SYMPTOMS.

The symptoms are a violent itching in the tongue and roof of the mouth when you are in company with a species of animals called "Gossips."

APPLICATION.

When you feel a fit of the disorder coming on, take a tea spoonful of the mixture, hold it in your mouth, which you must keep closely shut till you get home.

By observing a strict compliance to the above you will find the cure complete.

Should you apprehend a relapse, keep a small bottle full about you, and on the slightest symptom repeat the dose.

The proprietor of the above recipe has used it to very good advantage for some years. He has applied it in his family to good advantage; he never saw it used but what it proved efficacious, and can therefore, recommend it to all as an invaluable medicine.

The following is taken from the "Weekly Wanderer," printed at Randolph, Vermont, June 5th, 1806.—En.

HYDROPHOBIA.

"Friend Miner—

"A certain ancient family of Philadelphia, have been in the practice of giving their children a preventive of the hydrophobia or dog-madness, perhaps for more than half a century past."

"I have examined the medicine when fresh, and attended to its application; and it is certainly elecampane root and nothing else, except when a little dry, a small quantity of gum arabic was mixed with it, for which cherry-tree gum may be used as a substitute. The directions are, to simmer slowly about a large table spoonful of the medicine set in a pint of milk, until nearly one half is wasted; then strain and drink it in the morning, fasting, and not to eat for four or five hours after. This dose is to be repeated agreeable to the order of nostrums, for three successive mornings, and omitting three, until nine days are taken—the patient to avoid getting wet or being much exposed to the heat of the sun, to abstain from high-seasoned diet and hard exercise, and if costive, to take a dose of salts—the above quantity is for a grown person, and should be varied occasionally."

"I have known the elecampane root employed in several cases of human subjects, and also given to almost every kind of tame animals that had been bitten, without a single instance of failure of success. Among the numerous instances of its use I shall mention but one; a number of swine being confined in a pen to fatten, one of them was bitten by a dog, certainly mad. If began with the symptoms, and bit the rest. The owner being desirous of giving the elecampane a full trial, on drenching him, received a wound in his hand. The infected hog was removed to another pen, where he died mad; whilst the rest of the five swine, and the bold experimenter to whom the wound was given, remained well."

"If any curious inquirer should wish to know the manner of operation of the means proposed, acting without any sensible effects, and yet producing a security against the hydrophobia, I candidly confess complete ignorance on the mysterious subject; neither do I know in what manner the dread of water, and other violent symptoms of the disorder are produced in the system, from the bite of an infected subject; nor yet the reason why, having once had the small pox, or being vaccinated, is a full security against a future infection."

"As not any of the processes proposed in regular practice, can be fully recommended from experiment, as affording security against this dreadful malady, I, therefore, hope it will not be deemed improper (having been frequently requested) that I have taken this method to promote the use of a simple means, which has been authorized by extensive experience, and by those who have used it, supposed to be infallible."

JOHN WATSON.

Irish Costume.—The rage of the Irish appears to us the more comical as the cut of their national costume is that of our dress coat. In Germany people of the lower classes wear long great coats, or when at work, short round jackets; in Belgium, France, and other countries, the working people wear very useful blouses, as also, in many counties of England, Paddy probably does not find this mode of dressing sufficiently elegant, preferring the French dress coat, with the high, useless collar, his long hanging swallow tails and open breast. With this he wears breeches, coming to the knee, with shoes and stockings or gaiters. Consequently, as regards the cut of his clothes, he is a "rail jointloman."

The covering of his head harmonizes with his coat, for instead of a useful, light, waterproof cap, he wears a quizzical, shapeless felt or silk hat, which may have been soaked a hundred times in the rain and dried again. That the higher and uncultivated classes should encumber themselves with so uncomfortable and inappropriate covering as our hats, and keep to them because they have become the fashion, is intelligible enough, but how such an absurd article of dress could have been kept up for years among millions of people of the laboring class, is to me incomprehensible.—[Koh's Iron.

MOVEMENTS OF THE POPE IN SPAIN.

A great deal of attention has been given of late to the numerous movements of the Pope and the Court of Rome throughout this country, in the additional appointments of many Bishops—the nature of their power—their peculiar claims—and the policy which seems to direct their conduct. It is very evident that the power of Rome, having diminished very much of late in France and Spain, a prodigious effort is making to establish a new religious system in this country hostile to the constitution and repugnant to the feelings of even American Catholics.

On this subject, and particularly interesting, too, we have had on hand, for a long time, the Madrid paper of 1st January, 1841, waiting for a reasonable moment to notice its contents, which we think has now arrived. It contains the most extraordinary developments regarding the power claimed by the Pope's representative in that land, independent of the government. The acts and laws thereof have been combated in so insolent a manner, that we must refer our readers forthwith to the official proof below, otherwise they could not credit for a moment so preposterous a claim, viz. not to be the owners of your own soil, and to put aside the acts and orders of the heads of departments of that government. These disclosures have never been published in this country nor in Great Britain. They will do more to enlighten the public than all the sectarian denunciations hitherto attempted by the pulpit and the press.

As our whig and locofoco parties have been so extremely sensitive in regard to Papal authority, we enquire, should an order come from Rome to establish a Rota tribunal in New York, would the Common Council have the moral courage to oppose it? We pause for a reply.

We find that in Spain the bishops are elected by the government—that the incumbents are all Spaniards, and not foreigners; whilst in the United States, legions of bishops—all foreigners—come direct from Rome, without any previous consultation, either from the public, the general, State or city government, and are installed at once in their respective dioceses—all bringing their appointments from a foreign potentate. In this country, however, as the sovereign power belongs to the people, the only check which can be made to the encroachments of the Pope, must come from their representatives, their trustees of churches, and ecclesiastical corporations. This, therefore, is precisely the question which agitates the Catholic Church in New Orleans, and which formerly marked the attempts of Bishop Hughes to nullify certain trustees in Buffalo and New York. The Romish power calls this opposition of trustees, "infidelity," and so forth; but it is nothing but the true effusion of American principles.

Shall the Pope have more power in the United States than in France or Spain?

REMARKABLE PHENOMENON.

To the Editor of the Neighbor—

Sir: In a communication from a friend of mine, Elder Wm. Martindale who is now preaching in Wayne county, Indiana, I received an account of the following singular phenomenon. As Washington was my former place of residence, and as I am acquainted with the place where this singular phenomenon took place, I have been anxious to see the facts, believing them to be men of probity and having confidence in their statement, it was somewhat interesting to me; thinking that the readers of your widely circulated journal might feel the same interest in the facts of the case, I have thought proper to forward it to you, leaving you to insert it, or not at your discretion.

The following is the account given.

Washington, Wm. Martindale, Dec. 22, 1843.

"But I must hasten to give you an account of a singular phenomenon which was seen in this neighborhood on the night of the 19th inst. It was reported that a pinhead had been seen at the Logan denuding (you know the place) and on the evening of the 19th, Jesse Fox, William and Lorenzo Fox, David Hale, James Wilson, and William Cole, with some others repaired to the place to see if they could discover and kill the monster; but failing in this they retired to the house of Solomon Mendonah at which place they stayed a short time, when they discovered a ball rising from the east in an oblique line, and as it ascended it moved towards the west with great rapidity until it was high in the heavens, leaving a streak of light behind it, which, to the natural eye, had the appearance of being a meteor, but on reflection formed a figure of 8, and then coming round formed a figure of 6, which also retained its position for the same space of time; it then was transformed into a figure of 6, which also remained for about a minute; it then was formed into a cypher or 0, which remained for about three minutes. The figures put together made 1846 in large figures, in the heavens. The phenomenon was indeed singular and has been a matter of great speculation with us."

Respectfully yours, &c., WILLIAM MARTINDALE.

CORRESPONDENCE OF GEN. J. B. SMITH AND HON. J. C. CALHOUN.

NATCHE, MS. Nov. 4th 1843.

Hon. John C. Calhoun, Dear Sir:—As we understand you are a candidate for the presidency at the next election, and as the Latter Day Saints (sometimes called Mormons) who now constitute a numerous class in the school of politics of this vast republic, have been troubled of an immense amount of property, and endured nameless sufferings by the state of Missouri, and from her borders have been driven by force of arms, contrary to our national covenants, and in vain we have sought redress by all constitutional, legal and honorable means, in her courts, her executive councils, and her legislative halls; and as we have petitioned Congress to take cognizance of our sufferings without effect; we have judged it wisdom to address you this communication, and solicit an immediate, specific and candid reply to What will be your rule of action, relative to us as a people, should fortune favor your ascension to the chief magistracy?

Most respectfully, Sir, your friend,

And the friend of peace, good order, and constitutional rights,

JOSEPH SMITH,

In behalf of the church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.

Hon. John C. Calhoun, Fort Hill, S. C.

(Hon. J. C. Calhoun's reply.)

Fort Hill, 21 Dec. 1843.

Sir,—You ask me what would be my rule of action, relative to the Mormons, or Latter Day Saints, should I be elected President, to which I answer; that if I should be elected, I would strive to administer the government according to the constitution and the laws of the union; and as the Latter Day Saints are a numerous class of citizens of different religious creeds, I should make none. As far as it depends on the executive department, all should have the full benefit of both, and none should be exempt from the operation.

But, as you refer to the case of Missouri, cannot you compel me to repeat, what I said to you at Washington; that according to my views the case does not come within the jurisdiction of the federal government, which is one of limited and specific powers.

With respect, Sir, &c., J. C. CALHOUN.

Mr. Joseph Smith.

Natchez, Miss., Jan. 2, 1844.

Sir:—Your reply to my letter of last November, concerning your rule of action towards the Latter Day Saints, if elected President, is at hand; and that you and your friends of the same opinion, relative to the matter in question, may not be disappointed as to me, or my mind, upon so grave a subject, permit me, as a law-abiding man, as a well wisher to the perpetuity of constitutional rights and liberty, and as a friend to the free worship of Almighty God, by all, according to the dictates of every person's conscience, to say I am surprised, that a man, or men, in the highest stations of public life, should have made up such a fragile view of a case, than which there is not one on the face of the globe fraught with so much consequence to the happiness of men in this world, or the world to come. To be sure, the first paragraph of your letter appears very complacent, and fair on a white sheet of paper; and who, that is ambitious for greatness and power, would not have said the same thing? Your oath would bind you to support the constitution and laws, and as all creeds and religions are alike tolerated, they must, of course, all be justified or condemned, according to merit or demerit—But why, tell me why, are all the principles men, held up for public stability, so cautiously careful not to publish the whole truth, they will judge a righteous judgment—law or no law; for laws and opinions, like the vanes of a weather-vane, change with the wind. One confession makes a law, and another repeals it, and one statement says that the constitution means this, and another that; and who does not know that all may be wrong? The opinion and pledge, therefore, in the first paragraph of your reply to my question, like the forced steam from the engine of a steam boat, makes the show of a bright cloud at first, but when it comes in contact with a purer atmosphere, dissolves to common air again.

Your second paragraph leaves you naked before yourself, like a likeness in a mirror, why you say that according to your view, the federal government is one of limited, and specific powers, and has no jurisdiction in the case of the Mormons. So then, a state can at any time, expel any portion of her citizens with impunity, and in the language of Mr. Van Buren, frosted over with your gracious "view of the case," though the cause is ever so just, government can do nothing for them, because it has no power.

Go on, then, Missouri, after another set of inhabitants, (as the Latter Day Saints say) have entered some two or three hundred thousand dollars worth of land, and made extensive improved a barren; good, then I say, banish the occupants or owners, or kill them, as the mobbers did many of the Latter Day Saints, and take their lands and property as a spoil; and let the legislature, as in the case of the Mormons, appropriate a couple of hundred thousand dollars to pay the mob for doing the job; for the renowned senator from South Carolina, Mr. J. C. Calhoun, says the powers of the federal Government are so specific and limited that it has no jurisdiction of the case! Oh ye people who groan under the oppression of tyrants, ye exiled Poles, who have felt the iron hand of Russian grasp; ye poor and unfortunate among all nations, come to the asylum of the oppressed; buy ye lands of the general government, pay in your money to the treasury to strengthen the army and the navy; worship God according to the dictates of your own consciences; pay in your taxes to support the great heads of a glorious nation; but remember a "foreign slave," is so much more powerful than the United States, the parent government, that it can exile you at pleasure, mob you with impunity; confiscate your lands and property; have the legislature sanction it; yes, even murder you, as an edict of an Emperor, and it does no wrong, for the noble senator of South Carolina, says the power of the federal government is so limited and specific that it has no jurisdiction of the case! What think ye of Impunity in Impunity.

Ye sons of the blessed of all ages, mark! Ye shades of departed sages, listen! Abraham, Moses, Homer, Socrates, Salom, Solomon, and all that ever thought of right and wrong, look down from your exaltations, if you have any power in the midst of council chambers, in safety, and when you have learned that fifteen thousand innocent citizens after having purchased their lands of the United States, and paid for them, were expelled from a sovereign state by order of the governor, at the point of the bayonet; their arms taken from them by the same authority; and their right of migration into said state, denied under pain of imprisonment, whipping, robbing, mobbing, and even death, and no justice or recompense allowed; and from the legislature, with the governor at the head, down to the justice of the peace, with a bottle of whiskey in one hand, and a Bowie knife in the other, hear them all declare that there is no justice for a Mormon in that state, and judge ye a righteous judgment, and tell me when the virtue of the states was silent while the honor of the general government lies hid; and what clothes a senator with wisdom? Oh nullifying Carolina! O little tempestuous Rhode Island! would it not be well for the great men of the nation to read the fable of the partial judge, and when part of the citizens of a state had been expelled contrary to the constitution, mobbed, rebuffed, plundered and many murdered, instead of searching into the course taken with Joanna, Southcott, Ann Lee, the French prophets, the Quakers of New England, and rebellious migrants, in the slave states, to hear both sides and then judge, rather than to hear the mortification to say, on it is my built that has killed a poor man, that alters the case! I must enquire into it, and if, and if?

If the general government has no power to reinstate expelled citizens to their rights, there is a monstrous hyperbole fed and fostered from the hard earnings of the people! A real "bull fight" upheld by acophony; and, although you may wink to the priests to stigmatize, "where the drunkards to swear, and in so the one and cry of impostor false prophet, God damn old Joe Smith, yet remember, if the Latter Day Saints are not restored to all their rights, and paid for all their losses, according to the known rules of justice and judgment, reciprocity and common honesty among men, that God will come out of his hiding place and vex this nation with a sore vexation—yes, the consuming wrath of an offended God shall smite through the nation, with as much direct and wide, as independence has glared through with pleasure and delight. Where is the strength of government? Where is the patriotism of a Washington, a Warren, and Adams! and where is a spark from the watch fire of '76, by which one candle might be lit, that would glimmer upon the confines of democracy? Well may it be said that one man is not a state; nor one state the nation. In the days of General Jackson, when France refused the first installment for spoils, there was power, force, and honor enough to rectify injustice and insult, and the money came; and shall Missouri, full of negro drivers, and white men stealing, go "unwhipped of justice," for ten fold greater sins than France! No! verily no! While I have power of body and mind; while I have virtue and grace grow; while I have love and vice in my heart; and while I have a sword and a spear, and a fragment of American liberty once won; I or my posterity will plead the cause of injured innocence, until Missouri makes atonement for all her sins—until she is degraded, degraded and damned to hell—where the worm dieth not and the fire is not quenched.

Why Sir, the power not delegated to the United States, and the states, belongs to the people, and Congress is not to do the people's business, have all power—and shall fifteen thousand citizens groan in exile? Can vain men, will ye not, if ye do not, restore them to their rights and $2,000,000 worth of property belonging to them, (the Latter Day Saints) as a body, their portion of power that belongs to them according to the constitution? Power has its convenience, as well as inconvenience.—The world was not made for Caesar alone, but Titus too?

I will give you a parable, a certain lord had a vineyard in a goodly land, which men labored in at their pleasure; a few meek men also went and purchased with money from some of these chief men that labored at pleasure, a portion of land in the vineyard, at a very remote part of it, and began to improve it, and to eat and drink the fruit thereof; when some vile persons, who regarded not man, neither feared the lord of the vineyard, rose up suddenly and robbed these meek men, and drove them from their possessions, killing many. This barbarous act made no small stir among the men in the vineyard, and all that portion who were attached to that part of the vineyard where the men were killed, rose up in grand council, with their chief

NOTICE TO EMIGRANTS AND LATTER-DAY SAINTS GENERALLY.

I feel it my duty to say to the brethren generally, and especially those who are emigrating to this place, that there is in the hands of the Trustee in Trust, a large quantity of lands, both in the city and adjoining Townships in this county, which is for sale—some of which belongs to the church and is designed for the benefit of the poor, and also to liquidate debts owing by the church, for which the Trustee in Trust is responsible. Some also is land which has been consecrated for the building of the Temple, and some for the Nauvoo House.

If the brethren who move in here and want an inheritance will buy their lands from the Trustee in Trust, they will thereby benefit the poor, the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and each then only be doing that which is their duty and which I know, by considerable experience, will be vastly for their benefit and satisfaction in days to come. Let all the brethren therefore, when they move into Nauvoo, consult President Joseph Smith the Trustee &c., and purchase their lands of him, and I am bold to say that God will bless them and will hereafter be glad they do so.

We hold ourselves ready at any time to wait upon the brethren and show them the lands belonging to the church and Temple &c., and can be found any day either at President Joseph Smith's Bar Room or the Temple Recorder's Office, at the Temple.

ABOUT six weeks ago a company of saints arrived in this place escorted by Elder Wandall who had in his charge a trunk belonging to Jane Elizabeth Manning. Sister Manning was not here then but has since arrived and can obtain no intelligence of her trunk; it is presumed that some one has got it in mistake as there was a number of passengers arrived at the same time. The trunk is about three feet long and covered with a light red hair skin, with the exception of the back, on which there is some white. It is directed Jane Elizabeth Manning, Nauvoo. Whoever will give such information as shall lead to the discovery of the trunk will be handsomely rewarded by applying to this office.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan? Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr. James M. Martien!

Inquire for Dr. James M. Martien's Invaluable remedy for the cure of Fevers.

For Dr. James M. Martien's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.

For Dr. James M. Martien's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills.

For Dr. James M. Martien's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.

For Dr. James M. Martien's Cephalic Shull, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that, in their curative virtues may be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing, and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having reached ripe years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr. James M. Martien is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fondest expectations; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by the future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

FOR THE.

THE ODE OF GENIUS TO TRUTH.

BY MISS E. R. SNOW.

I'll sing to thee, O Truth!—Thy laws are given
For my directory 'ere earth and heav'n!
I sing of thee—I prize thy presence more Than all the gifts of richly treasur'd lore—
I sing thy praises—thou art all to me—
I leave no pow'r but that confid' by thee.

Eternal beauties in thy features glow,
And from thy lips eternal fountains flow;
Let the pure lustre of thy radiant eye
Beam thro' my soul and lift my nature high;
The master strokes that on my pulses roll
Are but the emanations of thy soul.

Let the fierce lightning chide her churlish brood;
Monster on monster, vent its spiteful mood—
Let crawling reptiles of the reptile school
Chastise offenders of their puny rule—
Let insects feel the weight of insects' paw
For the transgression of an insect law;
But, Truth! thy advocate shall not descend
To sordid means, thy honor to defend;
For thou, O Truth! wilt not ignobly bend
To sordid means, for a noble end.

Should lofty Genius strike a feeble string;
Nox in thy presence, Truth, of Truth I'll sing:
Then art the basis of each worthy theme—
Thine is the lustre in each golden beam:
Wide as eternity, diffuse thy light
Till joyous day shall burst the shades of night:
Benighted earth, illumine with thy rays—
The slumbering nations, waken with thy blaze.

In falsehood's stream, let error bathe his soul
And slander bend to envy's base control;
Be thou, O Truth! my arbiter and guide—
Beneath thy standard, let my feet abide—
Let thy celestial banner be unfurl'd,
Until its crescent circumscribes the world;
On hope's high pinions, write thy hallowed name
And plant thy signet, on the spire of fame.

Go forth and conquer—all to thee shall bow,
And feeble laurels wreath thy noble brow:
The palm of victory waits to crown thy war—
The seal of triumph lingers not afar.
Victorious Truth! the conquering scepter wield
Till all thy foes in meek submission yield—
Until inquiry spreads its arms abroad,
And knowledge smiles to his instinctive rod—
Till party zeal is shrouded with disgrace,
And superstition hides his lengthen'd face—
Till all stupidity is forced to fly—
Till ignorance and prejudice shall die—
Till pompous error, vanquish'd, hecks the dust
And princely falsehood fires his smoldering lust;
Then shall thy fiat hush the world in awe
And barbarous isles exult to hear thy law;
Strong as omnipotence, thy arm shall prove,
And as eternal as the throne above.

QUEEN VICTORIA.

Before leaving London, Elder Lorenzo Snow presented to her Majesty Queen Victoria, and her Royal Highness Prince Albert, through the politeness of Sir Henry Wheatley, two neatly bound volumes of the Book of Mormon, which had been donated by President Brigham Young, and left in the care of Elder Snow for that purpose; which circumstance generated the following lines:

Of all the monarchs of the earth
That wear the robes of royalty,
She has inherited by birth
The broadest wealth of majesty.
From hereditary throne
She descends not without a light;
While earth a dismal nothing brings
To other nations day and night.
All earthly thrones are fleeting things,
Where lights and shadows intervene;
And royal honors often bring
The scaffold of the guillotine.
But still her power is approved—
All monarchs deem her worth the throne;
Yet, like the youth who in Jewry dwelt,
Quitting is lacking, even there.
But let a prize possessing more
Of worth, than crown with pomp and rife—
A word of edification be
To her, the throne of majesty.
That glory, however faintly gleams,
To worthy of royal care;
And better by her own example
Than royal pomp and state declare.
O would she own her influence best—
The influence of royalty, Mankind's kingdom to extend,
And Zion's nursing mother be.
Thus with the glory of her name
To earth's dominion a lofty spire,
She'd win a wreath of endless fame,
To last when other wreaths expire.
Though over millions could be reigned—Herself a powerful nation's head;
To bend her everlasting gaze
To serve the king, the Lord of Hosts.
For there are crowns and thrones on high,
And kingdoms there, to be confer'd—
There honors wait that never die,
There fame's immortal trumpet is heard.
Truth is hers—his Jehovah's word,
Likings and goodness and peace bear.

In darkness lies the sun's light; and

Ye have no justice: O earth, give ear!

The time, the time is now at hand

To give a glorious period birth;

The Son of God, will take command

And rule the nations of the earth.

AN APPEAL TO THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF MAINE.

Respected fellow-citizens.—I was born in the county of York, district of Maine, in the year 1793. My first lesson on the principles of political and religious freedom, was learned among her brave and virtuous sons; and when in after years, we had come to the resolve that the number of our citizens, the great extent of our territory, as well as the geographical position which we occupied, all claimed sovereignty, we as a band of enlightened freemen arose, and obtained for her the title of "free and independent" among the sister states. More than forty years of my life can I boast of being a happy citizen of Maine. With her hardy republicans I passed through all the vicissitudes and privations of peace and war, during that period. My father, as is well known to thousands, was identified with the long line of illustrious patriots, who achieved our liberties in the war of the revolution. From him I received the first impression of the rights of man. By him I was taught, before I understood the terms, that men are naturally born free, and as such have an indefeasible right to worship God according to the dictates of their own understanding of his perfections. But the lesson we have so recently learned from the executive of a foreign state, admonishes us that the day of American liberty is on the wane. That unless something to retrieve her lost character be shortly done, we may as well content ourselves, and expect the days of Nero and a Caligula. It is not unknown to you that the entire church of Latter Day Saints have been expelled from the State of Missouri, for the simple fact that they believed the fullness of the gospel of Christ, had been restored to them through the ministration of angels; and that the Book of Mormon, was a divinely inspired record of the aboriginals of the western hemisphere. These two facts were sufficient in that state, with L. W. Boggs at the head of the executive department, to exterminate us in the chill of winter; to burn our dwellings—to rob us of our property—to ravish, torment, and murder our women and helpless children. After paying hundreds of thousands of dollars for land, and making improvements worthy the character of American operatives, all which were lost to us; the managers of the war, acting under the direct authority of the chief magistrate, forced us, at the point of their bayonets, to sign a treaty, the terms of which would have disgraced the dawning deeds of a Pharaoh or an Antiochus. In this treaty we covenanted to part with all our lands to defray the expenses of the war; a war which they themselves had created, and which they, with a barbarity disgraceful to savage warfare, had hitherto prosecuted against us. Another article in the treaty provided that we should forthwith leave the state of Missouri, and never make any further attempt to raise crops, or to do any thing whereby the citizens might take offense; for, said one of the governing generals, "if you do, my men will be upon you, and you will be destroyed, men, women and children;" and in whatever light we looked upon the proceedings of the governor, whether our cause was just or not, it was all the same with him; our final departure from the state was the grand object with him, and he would see it accomplished. A third article claimed, that all our leading men were to be given up to him (General Clark) to be tried for high treason. Among the number was our beloved Prophet. A court martial was immediately instituted, in which it was decreed that the Prophet, together with a few others, should be shot at six o'clock next morning. This, however, was prevented by the remonstrance of one or two of Clark's officers. They were immediately conducted to prison, where they suffered the greatest indignity. Many scores suffered the same fate. Yet not the least vestige of legal proceeding was ever seen in the whole affair. No testimony was had; none called against them. It has been carefully estimated by our historians that not far from fourteen thousand persons were ejected from Missouri in that infernal affair, that should disgrace with tears the face of every American. The same historians estimate that not far from three hundred were either directly slaughtered, or from extreme sufferings from imprisonment—from hunger—the child of winter, being reduced to the necessity, in many instances, of braving the winter blasts in a naked situation, were subjected to various disorders, that hurried them to a premature grave.

One more case and one only will I relate, as our history has been pretty fully made known to the people of the United States. Near Hays's mill, a company consisting of about forty men with their families, who had not yet participated in the turmoil of those times, being mostly strangers in that part of the country who being informed of the times in other counties entered into stipulations to live in peace with their new neighbors. It was solemnly agreed that if either party should afterwards discover any thing likely to come upon the other, injuries to them, the party having a knowledge should forthwith inform the other. This agreeing the delegates retired each to their respective party. The points were busy about that time in preparing their dwellings for the approaching winter; and thought themselves perfectly secure under the treaty so solemnly formed. In a very few days, however, they discovered their mistake. The very same delegates who swore friendship to the saints, came upon them in an unguarded hour, with between two and three hundred men, and drove them from place to place, till at length they were driven into an old smith's shop, where they were slaughtered indiscriminately. In that massacre some eighteen or nineteen were butchered, who from the peril of the times found one common grave. Being promiscuously heaped together in an old excavation for water. Their surviving friends at the peril of their own lives, performed their last rites of sepulture.

Nothing now remains to point out their lowly sepulchres, but their shapeless mound, fast hastening to decay. But they live in our tender regards. In the affection of every saint while the world shall survive, they shall have an imperishable mansion; an everlasting monument to perpetuate their name. We have sought for justice in the courts of that state; we have presented our memorial to the legislature, humbly praying for the restoration of our property and our rights as American citizens. We have expended thousands and thousands of dollars in various attempts to recover our just claims; but even to this time we have not a consoling hope that Missouri will ever do any thing for us. Nay, they still hold the hand of persecution, raised, if possible, to cut off our name from under heaven. Every possible scheme that can be devised, is brought into requisition for our overthrow. They have from time to time kidnapped our brethren, citizens of the state of Illinois. Loud and frequent demands are made on the Governor for the body of Gen. Joseph Smith. Several times, since leaving Missouri, he has been tried in the courts of Illinois and the Federal courts, and has always been honorably acquitted.

We have also presented our memorial to Congress, accompanied with a schedule of claims, but the only consolation we have yet received from them is, that "our cause is just; but government has no power to redress us." Preparations are being made at the present time to resume our memorial in the halls of congress. Should we fail of obtaining our rights from every source whatever, we still shall have gained one point, to make it apparent to all the world, that what was wanting in this case, was neither a criminal nor a prosecutor. Another point we shall have gained, to be the discoverers of a desiderium in the constitution of the United States. If neither the civil court of an independent state, neither its legislature nor the great federal compact, has power to guard the lives and property of American citizens, then we shall have made a second discovery, that the framers of our revered constitution did not understand the business of legislation.

Were the venerable fathers of our independence permitted to revisit the earth, how would they frown with indignation at the disgrace of their country. In vain they toiled, they bled in vain; if one of the states of the great Republic Union, has a right to plunder, burn, murder, and exterminate from its borders, its peaceable citizens for conscience sake. Should we fail of redress in the present congress, we shall impudently at every subsequent one, till we gain the object of our most ardent desires. From our origin to the present time, we have been a law-abiding people. Our book of laws that we received by immediate revelation through our beloved seer, enjoins us in the most explicit manner, not to transgress the laws of the land. That if lawbreakers should be found among us, they are to be given up to the laws of the land. These things we have always done. With all these facts before the world, we believe that government has the power, amply and adequately to redress us. We expect it. We have the most indelible right to expect it. While the crimson current that administers to our being, shall flow, we will contend for our injured rights.—We intend to test the efficacy of the government to the core. We believe that peradventure, there may yet be virtue, and that our cause may yet be heard. We can never forget the injuries done us in Missouri. They are ever present to our minds. We feel it impossible to efface them from our memories. We can never forget the blood of our brethren, so wantonly lavished to satisfy the infernal thirsts of men, as heinous to the righteous, as the fumes of hell. Were we to forget them, heaven itself would upbraid us. The immortal shades of our martyred brethren would spurn us from their presence. Their cries would rise from under the altar of God, as viewed by the ancient prophet, would ascend to the throne of Jehovah against us. We swear by the precious memory of the illustrious dead—the fathers of our independence, that we will remember them. We will do all in our power to mete out justice to those who without the least cause have murdered our friends. And if we fail may heaven and earth bear us witness that what is wanting in this case, is not strength in the law, arising from the peculiar nature of American institutions; but a faithful and virtuous administrator. Now therefore, knowing as I do, your devoted attachment to the cause of freedom and the free institutions of your country, and believing as I have every reason to, that the voice of the oppressed will not be unheeded by you, especially when it is declared to you that many from your happy state, are at this time suffering the highest degree of injustice from mobocracy in Missouri; I, in the name of every faithful saint, especially those who received their birth and education in Maine, appeal to your wisdom, to that high legal attainment which characterizes you as a sovereign state—to your natural sense of the rights of man, and to the spirit of patriotism that burns within your bosoms, to do all within the grasp of your power, to redress us. We declare to you and to all the world, that we are an innocent people; and that for the gospel's sake, for the sake of the principles of glorious and eternal truth; we have been mobbed, whipped, imprisoned, tormented and slain. Should any man reply that if we are persecuted for the truths sake, we ought to receive it patiently, and not seek that which is our own, we respond, that if no other consideration whatever, should prompt us, the disgraced institutions of our bleeding country demand that we make every effort to magnify her laws. We seek for justice that recurrences of deeds so frightful may not distract the nation hereafter. We make this appeal to the people of the state of Maine to let them know that an injury has been done to the church of Christ in the nineteenth century. An injury which if unrepaid by government, will establish the most dangerous precedent, as others of a more direful nature will have license to follow. All past experience admonishes us that in a republican government, when vice and corruption gain the ascendancy over virtue, the most terrible revolutions are sure to follow.

I will now relate a dream which I had, near the time that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints was driven from Jackson county, in Missouri.

In my dream, I was at the capital of the United States. All was solemn as the tomb. The voice of the eloquent orator was hushed to silence. The senator, the sage, the honorable, the rich and poor together, all were clad in mourning. Indeed, nature herself, and all things seemed to participate in the general gloom.—All was silent but the voice of one man. His was low and solemn as the lonely sepulchre. In the archives of state, there was a twilight, by which, with some difficulty, one could peruse the records. As I was returning from a spacious bureau, where it seemed I had been reading; in an opposite part of the room, I saw a man approaching the same bureau. I did not know him, but felt assured within myself that it was one of the ancients of the nation. He took from the bureau two or three small boxes; and as he presented one of them to me, exclaimed, "these were the archives of state; and while in the act of placing it in my hand, finished the sentence he had commenced, but it is turned to blood." I saw while yet the words were on his tongue, the box dissolve to blood. Then I turned to view the other boxes; and they were also turned to blood.

With sentiments of respect,
I remain, your humble servant,
BENJAMIN ANDREWS.

ANCIENT RUINS.

Every day adds fresh testimony to the already accumulated evidence on the authenticity of the "Book of Mormon." At the time that book was translated there was very little known about ruined cities and dilapidated buildings. The general presumption was, that no people possessing more intelligence than our present race of Indians had ever inhabited this continent, and the accounts given in the Book of Mormon concerning large cities and civilized people having inhabited this land, was generally disbelieved and pronounced a humbug. Since then has been thrown some light on this interesting subject. Stephens in his "Incidents of Travels in Central America," has thrown in a flood of testimony, and from the following statements it is evident that the Book of Mormon does not give a more extensive account of large and populous cities than those discovered now demonstrate to be even in existence.—Ed.

(From the Texas Telegraph, Oct. 11.)

We have been informed by a gentleman who has traveled a large portion of the Indian country of Northern Texas, and the country lying between Santa Fe and the Pacific, that there are vestiges of ancient cities and ruined castles or temples on the Rio Puerco and on the Colorado of the west. He says that on one of the branches of the Rio Puerco, a few days travel from Santa Fe, there is an immense pile of ruins that appear to belong to an ancient temple. Portions of the walls are still standing, consisting of huge blocks of limestone regularly hewn, and laid in cement. The building occupies an extent of more than an acre. Its two or three stories high, has no roof, but contains many rooms, generally of a square form, without windows, and the lower rooms are so dark and gloomy that they resemble caverns rather than the apartments of an edifice built for a human habitation. Our informant did not give the style of architecture, but believes it could not be erected by Spaniards or Mexicans; in the stones are much worn by the rains, and indicate that the building has stood several hundred years. From his description we are induced to believe that it resembles the ruins of Palenque or Uxulim. He says there are many similar ruins on the Colorado of the West, which empties into the Gulf of California. In one of his valleys of the Cordillera traversed by this river, and about four hundred miles from its mouth, there is a large temple still standing, its walls and spires presenting scarcely any trace of dilapidation, and were it not for the want of a roof might still be deemed habitable. Near it, scattered along the declivity of a mountain, are the ruins of what may have been once a large city. The traces of a large aqueduct, part of which is however in the solid rock, are still visible. Neither the Indians residing in the vicinity, nor the oldest Spanish settlers of the nearest settlements, can give any account of the origin of these buildings. They merely know that they have stood there from the earliest periods to which their traditions extend. The antiquarian who is desirous to trace the Aztec or Toltec ages in their migrations from the northern regions of America, may find in these ancient edifices many subjects of curious speculation.

PHENOMENA.—The brig Foster, from Bath, (Me.) on her passage to Key West, reports that on the 21st Nov. during a gale at sea, "A huge ball resembling fire, about the size of a horse's head, appeared between the two masts of the vessel, about 20 or 40 feet from the deck, and burst with a report like that of a heavy clap of thunder, followed by a sharp flash of lightning, stunning nearly all on board. It was indeed an 'awfully beautiful' sight—the emanating sparks illuminating the air for several minutes after the explosion."

"WONDERFUL CAVES IN IOWA.—In the lead district, within a few miles of the town of Du Buque, is a cave lately discovered, which abounds in inexhaustible quantities of rich lead ore. Some of the apartments are beautiful, full of spar and other formations. In one section, the caverns extend to an unknown distance; it has been travelled three miles without any sign of its termination, or without the sight of walls on either side.—Compared to this the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, and other subterranean wonders dwindle into littleness. The American continent, when fully explored, will be found to contain the most magnificent natural curiosities in the world."

Accounts from Java of the 6th of June, state that an earthquake had occurred at Nias, which destroyed a great many houses, and that numbers of the inhabitants were buried in the ruins.

Nearly all the barracks in Ireland are in a state of military defence. This looks as if the British Government was preparing for the worst.

"MILLERIES.—Reuben H. Brown publishes in the Portland American an appeal to the people called "Milleries;" that he has given away all his money to various brethren and in aid of the cause under the impression that the world was to come to an end on the 14th of April. His wife told him better, but he would not listen to her and some of the Millerites told him he was crazy but took his money. Now he says he finds that although the world has by no means come to an end, his money has. He wants them to refund, but they place their fingers on their noses and tell him he "can't come in." Well, served him right."

ADAM HORN, THE MURDERER. A DESPERATE CHARACTER.

We have already stated, that Horn was convicted of the murder of his wife at Baltimore, after the jury had been out but a few minutes. The Baltimore Sun has been able to collect many interesting and startling facts concerning his history, which are worthy of notice at this time.

It appears that his real name is Adam Hellman, born at Worms, in 1792, and consequently is a Hessian by birth. He was apprenticed to the tailoring business; and after serving out his time, he worked his way over Germany, and finally arrived at Baltimore in 1817. He worked three days in that city as a journeyman, and was much esteemed as an intelligent, industrious, well beloved young man. But it seems that he had imbibed a strong dislike to the female race, as much as an impression that they were entitled to no rights or consideration. Women, according to his opinion, was only created as a convenience for the other sex, to serve in the capacity of a lever of wood and drawer of water, to cook his victuals, darn his stockings, never to speak but when spoken to, and to crouch in servile fear while in his presence. He regarded the scriptural phrase applied to the sex, as "helpmate for man," in its literal sense, while he would deny her all social privileges and rights. And this is his present opinion, for when he was recommended to advise his son to marry a religious woman, he said, No; no, not women must know how to hold their tongues and obey—she has nothing to do with man.

In 1820, he emigrated to London county, in Virginia, and boarded with a German farmer of character by the name of Abel, who took a great fancy to him, and concealing his opinion of the sex, he was a welcome inmate of his large family, and in the course of time succeeded in securing the affections of his daughter, Mary Abel was at this time in the twentieth year of her age, a blithe, buoyant, and light-hearted country girl, with rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes, totally unacquainted with the deceptions of the world, and looking to the future to be a counterpart of the past, which had truly been to her one continued round of innocent pleasure and happiness. With a kind and affectionate disposition, and a thorough and practical knowledge of all the varied duties of housewifery, she would be just such an one as would be calculated, if united to a kind and affectionate husband, to pass through the chequered scenes of life with all the sweets of contentment, and but few of the bitters of discord. She married Hellman with the consent of the family, and lived with them two years, restrained by their presence from evincing the fondness of her temper; he gradually lost all affection for her, and after the birth of a daughter

he became furiously jealous of her, accused her of infidelity, and treated her with the greatest cruelty and contempt. In return for every attention and kindness, she received nothing but threats and imprecations.—Instead of the endearing name of wife, she was always called "my woman," and his ideas of the degrading duties and dishonorable station of woman fully applied to her. He had, however, never used any personal violence, and she consequently felt no need, for the sake of her children, not to desert him. In the spring of 1824, he rented a small place in London, about a mile from her father's, where they lived for nearly eight years, during which time, in June, 1827, John Hellman, a third child, was born, at which time he openly declared that if she ever had another he would kill her. This, however, was her last child. On one occasion, while living on this place, he left her in a fit of passion, and went to Baltimore, leaving both wife and children almost destitute, where he remained about three months, and returned with promises of reformation. His father-in-law emigrated to Ohio, where he purchased for all his children a section of land. Hellman received for his wife's share a section in Carroll county, to which he removed, selling his property in Virginia for $3,000, though every one was astonished at his possessing so much wealth by the mere use of his needles. During the five years of his residence in Ohio, the lot of his poor wife was every way miserable. He left Carroll for Logan county, and then possessed two fine farms, and resided near his two brothers-in-law, Gen. John and Mr. George Abel, who were comfortably conditioned with large families. Hellman had then three fine children, and about a year after their residence in Logan, he attempted to poison his wife, which she discovered and prevented. For the year following this event he apparently became more morose and sullen, but his family had become used to it, and expected nothing better.

In the month of April, 1830, all three of the children were suddenly taken sick, and laid in great suffering forty eight hours, when Louisa, the eldest, aged 17 years, and John the youngest aged 12 years died, and both were buried in one grave, leaving the mother inconsolable for her loss. Her whole attention however, was still required for poor Henry, who laid several days in great suffering, but he finally recovered. This was a sad stroke to the heart of the already grief-stricken mother, which was doubly heavy on her, from the belief she entertained that their death had resulted from poison, and that that poison had been administered to them by the hand of their father; by that hand which should have brushed away from their path everything that could harm them! The belief is now general throughout the country that their blood is also on the head of Adam Hellman, but whether true or false, remains to be decided between him and his God. It would seem, if the charge be correct, to have been a miraculous intervention of Providence that poor Henry, the child of misfortune, the one alone above all others that his father disliked and ill treated, was the one that outlived the effects of the deadly poison. After protracted suffering we come to the history of her hard fate. On Saturday morning, the 28th of September, 1839, Mrs. Rachel Abel, the wife of Mr. George Abel, came to the house to see her sister-in-law, and so soon as she entered the door she was surprised to see Hellman lying in bed in the front room, with his head, face and clothing covered with blood. With an exclamation of wonder, she asked him what was the matter. He replied, affecting to be scarcely able to speak from weakness and loss of blood, that two nights previous at a late hour, a loud rap summoned him to the door, on opening it, two robbers entered, one a large dark man, (meaning a negro) and a small white man, when he had immediately been levelled to the floor with a heavy club. How he had got into bed, he could not tell, but that he had been lying there suffering ever since, unable to get out.

On hearing this story, and from his bloody appearance and apparent faintness not doubting it, Mrs. Abel exclaimed, "where in the name of God, is your wife?" to which he replied, "I do not know; go and see." On pushing open the back room door, a scene of blood met her view that it would be impossible fully to describe. In the centre of the room lay the mangled corpse of the poor wife, with her blood drizzling the floor while the ceiling, walls and furniture were heavily sprinkled with the streams which had evidently gushed from the wounds she had received in the dreadful struggle. At this moment George Abel entered, and shortly after him a coroner and a physician. Twelve men were immediately selected as a jury of inquest, to examine into the cause of the death of Mrs. Hellman. The jury being sworn, and having entered on their duty, General Abel openly charged Adam Hellman with being her murderer. The jury was struck with astonishment as they looked

WOOD CHOPPING.

On Monday and Tuesday last a great number of our citizens turned out for the purpose of chopping and hauling wood for the Prophet. At the instance of the twelve. Although the weather was unpleasant, and there was a good deal of drizzling rain. There were upwards of two hundred choppers assembled on the occasion, and from forty to fifty teams; and the way the trees were dissected, and strung along the yard of the 'Mansion' was a caution. On Tuesday a number of hands assembled for the purpose of cutting and preparing the wood for the fire, and by one o'clock it was all cut, and piled. The brethren did honor to themselves on the occasion, and they certainly did honor to the Prophet, in manifesting so great a willingness to assist him through the cold weather, and drive Jack Frost out of doors. It reminds us of the old adage: 'Friendship is more to be desired than riches.'

In our Foreign Exchanges we have noticed of great interest, this week. O'Connell's case was put off till the 14th of this month, and he had retired to his country seat at Derry-nane.

It will be gratifying to many of our English friends, to learn that after the continual pulling down of wages, in that country, there is, at present one exception, and that they are beginning to take a retrograde movement.

We clip the following from the 'Manchester Guardian'—ADVANCE OF WAGES. We are glad to hear that ten of the largest manufacturers of woollen in this town have agreed to advance the wages of the weavers in their employ. This advance will make a difference of 2s. per week in the wages of the poor weavers.

We are glad to find that the Hon. H. Douglas, and other of our Western Representatives, have been contending strenuously for appropriations to improve the Rapids; two millions have been talked of, we hope they will succeed, if for nothing else, than to fulfill the prophecy of one of our honorable Gentlemen; 'that gold and silver would flow up the Mississippi river,' if, and if;—this would do it without an if.

We understand that the Carthaginian mob, who assembled, for the purpose of protecting a man from the law in case of bastardy, have all dispersed. They must be men of very chaste minds, and have very exalted notions of morality.

STEAMBOAT DISASTERS.

The Sylph, Leander, and Meridian, have been lost, within the last two weeks, between this City and the mouth of the Ohio. They were all heavily laden; and the freight of the last named boat had been in part obtained at this place.

We believe they were all insured, wholly or in part; but whether the insurance will cover the entire loss, which is heavy, we cannot say. Several other boats have also been lost, at different points, since the commencement of the winter.—Alton Telegraph.

Distressing Accident.—Recklessness of Steamboat Officers.

One of the most distressing accidents that we have ever been called upon to record says the Maysville, Ky Eagle of the 22nd ult. occurred in this city on Saturday night—if, indeed it can be called an accident, which was caused by the gross neglect of those who had the power to prevent it. Mr. M. W. Campbell, a respectable merchant of Nashville, Tennessee, while endeavoring to land in a yawl from the steamer Ben Franklin, No. 6, was crushed to death, in a manner shocking to contemplate, between the Franklin and the Mail, then lying cabled at the wharf. The particulars of this melancholy disaster, are detailed to a Coroner's jury, prove that the deceased came to his death by the gross neglect and carelessness of the officers of the Ben Franklin, and that their conduct, or at least that of Capt. Summons, is with out the shadow of an excuse, and deserves the censure of every man of proper feelings.

The officers of the boat insisted upon landing the deceased by a yawl, in order to save three dollars wharfage, which is charged to boats touching at the piers. The unfortunate man objected to the proceeding on account of its danger, and entered the yawl with reluctance. He had scarcely taken his seat when the steamers came together with a tremendous concussion, and crushed him to death.

Curious Relic of the Past—Growth of New York City.—Workmen engaged in digging up the street, on the corner of Houston and Broadway, threw up on Saturday, with their spades, an old mile stone, on which was cut: One mile to New York! This stone was placed there years ago when that part of the city was the country. Where the Astor House now stands was then the heart of this metropolis, where the milestone was found is now the centre.

Stand Fast.—Under all the trials of life stand fast! Would you wish to live without a trial? Then would you wish to die but half a man?—at the very best but half a man. Without trial you cannot guess at your own strength. Men do not learn to swim upon a table. They must go into deep water and buffet the surges. If you wish to understand their true character, if you would know their whole strength, and of what they are capable, throw them overboard! over with them! and if they are worth saving they will swim ashore themselves.

Another Boat Lost.—The Huntville which arrived here on Saturday reports that the Leander struck some obstruction in the river on Friday morning, opposite St. Genevieve Island, and sunk to the hurricane deck. The leader left here on Thursday, for the mouth of the Ohio. She had the bulk of 1000 barrels on board, principally beef, pork and lard, which was to be re-shipped on the Julia Chouteau, at the mouth. The Leander was owned by Capt. R. M. Strother of this city, and the insurance expired about ten days ago. The boat and cargo are a total loss.—[Mo. Rep.]

An English paper gives an account of a tea party of sixty old women, who were the mothers of eight hundred and sixty nine children.

They must have had something to talk about at the tea party.

The following sentiment was lately given at Temperance Festival: 'Reformed Drunkards: For abandoning their horns of grog, they will find an excellent substitute in the horn of plenty.'

A native of Kentucky imitates the crowing of a rooster so remarkably well that, it is said, the sun has, upon several occasions, risen two hours earlier by mistake!

In Death not Divided.—A man, residing at Sursum, having descended, a few days back, into a wine vat, was overcome with the gas generated therein and was unable to ascend. His wife, in her anxiety to succor him, was also overpowered, and both perished.

A ferocious Bird.—A letter from Graetz (Styria) states, that a vulture lately pounced down on an infant, ten months old, which a woman had left for a moment on the grass, in a field near Waz. It carried up its prey, and, alighting fifty yards off, began to devour it. Some farmers' men ran up and frightened it away, but the child was so dreadfully torn that it died immediately.

INTERESTING CASE.—A venerable old way by the name of Cass got married 'out west' not long since, and he christened his first child—'Interesting.'

Rhode Island exempts no females (taxable, we presume) from performing military duty or paying the penalty, as fines have recently been imposed upon some of the sex!

HABIT.—Select that course of life which is the most excellent, and custom will render it the most delightful.

The following is the best definition of a loafer yet perpetrated:—
"A person who begs all the tobacco he uses—knows more people than are acquainted with him, when he meets them—often looks at a borrowed watch to see the time, and takes the paper six months and tramps."

HOARSENESS.—One drachm of freshly scraped horse radish root, to be infused with four ounces of water, in a close vessel, for 2 hours and made into a syrup, with double its weight in vinegar, is an approved remedy for hoarseness; a teaspoonful has often proved effectual; a few teaspoons, it is said, have never been known to fail in removing hoarseness.—[Portland Advertiser.]

"I would advise you to put your head in a dyetub, it's rather red," said a joker to a gaudy headed girl. "In return, sir, I would advise you to put your head into an oven, it's rather soft," was the reply.

FACT.—"All men are born free and equal;" for we brought nothing into this world, and it is certain we can carry nothing out.

Two children have been born at Lexington, Indiana, whose breast bones are united the whole length.

A Barbadoes paper of 19th ult. says a female shark, measuring eleven feet five and three-quarter inches, was taken on Wednesday last, a short distance below Hole-Town. On the monster having been cut open, it was found to contain the incredible number of three hundred and fifty-seven young ones.

The labor of editor's life is not so much what he has to "write" as what he has to "read."

"Will you clasp my cloak, sir?" asked a young lady of the gentleman who was to accompany her from a party. "Yes, and its contents," replied he, putting his arm around her waist.

EXTRAORDINARY COURAGE.—The "Echo," of Vesone, gives the following instance of courage and resolution in a young woman, a milliner, of that town. A favorite dog which she had was, towards the end of September last, bitten by another, proved to be mad. Being loth to lose her pet companion she had the wound cauterized, and kept the animal closely confined under her own eye. However, after the lapse of forty days, it showed unquestionable indications of hydrophobia, and she made up her mind to destroy it. On opening her door to procure assistance for that purpose, the dog got out and gained the street. She hastened after it, calling out as she went along to warn the people to keep out of the reach of the rabid animal. At length she caught it, and, grasping it by the skin at the neck, desired to have a rope. This was, after a while, brought, or rather thrown, to her, for no one could venture to come near her. Still holding the dog with one hand, she, with the other and her teeth, made a slip knot, passed it over the neck of her favorite, and effected its death by strangulation. A veterinary surgeon afterwards examined the animal, and pronounced that it was in one of the highest stages of canine madness. The Commissary of Police has made a report to the Prefect of this act, and claimed an honorary reward for the heroic milliner.

THE FORTIFICATIONS OF PARIS.—La Réforme states, that, when the Ministry, of which M. Thiers was the head, brought forward the plan of fortifying Paris, it was asserted, that any projectiles thrown from the detached forts could never reach the city. It is now ascertained, that only one-fifth of the capital is beyond the reach of the bomb-shells and bullets of the forts, and chance has willed it that this privileged part is precisely the Palais Royal, the Bank, the Exchange, the Place Vendôme, the Opera, the Chaussee d'Antin, the Faubourg St. Monore, the Place St. George's, the Tuilleries, and the Hotel of the Minister of Finance. The detached forts, as they are now disposed by the Ministry, Paris no longer in Paris, but in the Fort of Pantin, or in the Fort of Bievre. Whether the fortifications be intended against a foreign force, or against the inhabitants of Paris a bombardment is the future prospect of our capital.

GRAMMAR IN THE BACKWOODS.—"Class in grammar may come on the floor. Now, John, commence." "All the world is in debt." Parse world?—"World is a general noun, common metre, objective case, and governed by Miller." "Very well. Sum, parse debt." "Debt is a common noun, in prepositional mood, and dreadful case." "That'll do. Read the next sentence." "Boys and girls must have their play." "Philip, parse boys." "Boys is a particular noun, single number, uncertain mood, laughable case, and agrees with girls." "The next." "Boys is a masculine noun, inferior number, conjunctive mood, and belongs to the girls, with which it agrees." "School's dismissed."

MURDER AND SUICIDE.

A tragedy was enacted on the 9th inst., about 8 miles from Kingston, Canada. A man who called himself Morgan Hamilton Giffen shot his wife, and afterwards shot himself. The ball entered her breast, and lodged in her back near the spine. There was some hope that she might recover. Giffen was found under the table in his own house, dead, the ball having gone through his breast. He was an American, and it is supposed that the name he went by was an assumed name, and that he had been an inmate of some penitentiary in the United States, for one of his hands were branded and part of one of his ears cut off.

The bite of an enraged cat will produce hydrophobia, without the animal's ever having been bitten—so says a late medical work and proves the assertion, by citing some frightful instances.—[Boston Bee.]

Steamboat Explosion.—The Meridian from this port for New Orleans, Capt. O. Daniels, about three o'clock on the 27th ult., struck a snag at the foot of Tower Island, and sunk in about ten feet water; the water being up to the cabin floor on one side and up to the name on the wheel house on the other. She lies athwart the channel.

We learn by a letter from her clerk, that her books, part of her furniture and a portion of her cargo will be saved. With the exception of some buffalo robes and furs, which were saved without injury, so much as is saved will be in a damaged condition. The boat will be a total loss. She left her on last Sunday week, with a cargo of 100 barrels and kegs of lard, 600 barrels pork, 400 barrels flour, 140 bales buffalo robes, and 115 head of cattle, together with smaller lots, making in all a pretty heavy freight. 114 head of the cattle and the buffalo robes and furs were saved. The balance is thought to be a total loss. The Meridian is owned by Mr. Charles Sample and others, and is thought to be insured in an office in Pittsburgh.—[Mo. Rep.]

SUDDEN RISE AND FALL OF THE SEA.

Another of those singular phenomena, to which attention has been recently called by Mr. Edmonds, of Penzance, occurred on Monday evening the 30th ult. at Penzance and Plymouth, at the beginning of the flood tide. It appears that, between four and five o'clock in the afternoon of that day, some men who had just returned from fishing saw their boat at Penzance pier left quite dry by the sea; immediately afterwards the sea returned with great swiftness, and within six or seven minutes she was again afloat in from two to three feet of water. This occurred four or five times in the course of an hour. It was observed, likewise, two or three times by two branch pilots of Penzance, who communicated the information. About the same time a small vessel came into the pier, and, after lying aground about five or ten minutes, was suddenly floated, and carried out of the pier directly against a strong breeze from the north-east, to a distance of 40 or 50 yards from the spot where she lay; she was then carried in again by a second influx, and left aground, when she was secured by a hauler. Afterwards she was floated and left quite aground twice in less than half an hour. In addition to these facts, it has been stated by the master of a vessel which was lying in Plymouth Pool on the day mentioned, that towards the evening, a most extraordinary flowing and ebbing of the sea occurred there, the velocity of which he estimated at eight knots an hour. The Charlestown, of that port, Captain Jenkins, was then also lying there, and her boat, with a boy on board, was whirled by the current to a considerable distance, and then caught under the bows of the vessel, so that it was with considerable difficulty that the boy was rescued from his perilous situation. It is rather remarkable that these circumstances should have occurred both at Plymouth and Penzance at nearly the same hour.—[West Briton.]

FALLS OF WATER IN NORWAY.

The New York correspondent of the New Orleans Courier mentions a curious fact in the geographical history of Norway, which has recently been made known to the scientific world, by Dr. Laugberg, of Christiania, who has discovered three most remarkable waterfalls, among the almost inaccessible rocks of Norland. One of these falls surpasses in height and the volume of water precipitated any waterfall in Europe, and almost rivals in the sublimity of its effects, our great natural wonder, the Falls of Niagara. A river at least two hundred feet wide, plunges into a ravine seven hundred feet deep! This huge body of water, before it reaches the bottom, is dissipated into mists which is collected and condensed by the rocks and shrubs, and trickles down in immense rills and cascades to the bed of the river, which again renewed, flows on as a broad deep stream. The other two waterfalls are little inferior in sublimity, though less high. Rivers of even larger size and thrown down sheer four hundred feet, into chasms formed by overhanging rocks, which rise for many hundred feet above the foaming waters. Norway has of late become a favorite country for English tourists, who are tired of the beaten continental track, and the discovery of these additional features to its magnificently bold scenery, will no doubt increase the attraction.—[Quincy Whig.]

TRIAL OF THE PIRATES OF THE SARAH LAVINIA.

William Brown alias David Babe, and Geo. Mathews, were placed upon trial in the U. S. Circuit Court before Judge Bates in this city on Monday, Dec. 15. William M. Price and A. Nash Esqrs. appeared on behalf of the prisoners, and Ogden Hoffman, Esq. U. S. District Attorney, for the Prosecution. A motion was made and granted for a separate trial for Babe, on the ground that Mathews' confessions would be injurious to him, when Mathews was remanded; and after empanelling a jury, Babe's trial was proceeded with.

Mr. Barrett opened the case to the Jurors. He stated that the Prisoner was placed upon trial for the murder of Walter A. Nichol, Mate of the schooner Sarah Lavinia, on the 20th July last. The indictment contains five counts,—the principle of which is, that the Prisoner conspired with others, and with a mallet of wood killed the Mate and threw him overboard. After which, he recapitulated the circumstances which the Prosecution expected to prove,—the vessel having been boarded, blood found on the mast, in the Captain's berth, &c., and the vessel in confusion. The bed-clothes in the Captain's berth had been saturated with molasses, though no vessel containing such was found on board, evidently showing that the design was to conceal the marks of blood. The prisoner and two others were seen to land from a small boat a few miles from where the vessel lay. They declared themselves to have belonged to a vessel from Poole, in England &c. The prisoner took from his pocket a gold watch; also three trunks and two bags. They paid to be put over to Sekonnet, whence they repaired to Newport, and finally reached this city. The identity of the clothing of the captain and mate with that traced to the possession of the prisoners, and the fact, admitted by Babe in his confession, that the Captain and Mate are dead. Mr. Barrett having closed, Geo. J. Thomas, of Alexandria, the owner of the Sarah Lavinia, deposed that she sailed from that port for Antigua on the 1st of July, with Charles M. Dearborn as Captain and Walter A. Nichol as Mate. Frederick Victoria, of Alexandria, the shipper of the crew, being next sworn, identified Babe at Hellman, lying prostrate in his bed, and demanded of the accuser, what evidence he had to substantiate such a charge. The afflicted brother, in reply, stated that he unfortunately had no evidence, but desired that the physician in attendance would examine Hellman's wounds. The examination was accordingly made, and the result was, that not a scratch, a cut, or a bruise, could be found on any part of his person. Not only morally, but practically, was it thus established, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that "her blood was on his head." He had evidently taken up a quantity of her blood and thrown it on his head and shoulders, in order to give credence to his story, which act alone served as a positive evidence of his guilt.—On a further search being made of the premises, his axe was found leaning against the bar post, about fifty yards from the house, reeking with blood, and hair sufficient sticking to it to identify it as that of the deceased—his knife covered with blood was found concealed on the hearth of the chimney—his tailor socks were found in the cellar, covered with blood—and the shirt he had on, as well as his arm, were saturated with blood—up to the elbow.

There was, therefore, nothing wanting to identify him, fully and conclusively, as the murderer, and he was forthwith committed for trial, and the remains of his victim, having laid two days exposed before discovery, were on the evening of the same day followed to the grave by a large concourse of friends and relatives, and deposited by the side of her two children, whom she had sorrowed over but five months previous.—The body was lying on the floor, but from the fact that a large quantity of blood was found in the centre of the bed, it is supposed that she was lying asleep at the time of the attack, wholly unconscious of any impending evil. The stains on the pillow indicated that she had partially risen up after the first blow, and had again been knocked back on the bed. The soles of her feet were saturated in blood, which led to the belief that she had managed to get out of bed, and had stood erect in her own blood on the floor before she was finally despatched. Six distinct cuts, apparently inflicted with the handle of an axe, were discovered on her head. The hands and arms were dreadfully bruised, as if she had, in the same manner as his second victim, endeavored to ward off the blows aimed at her head, while the little finger of the left hand, and the forefinger of the right hand were both broken. A large gash, laying open the flesh to the bone, was visible on the right thigh, apparently inflicted with an axe; and across the whole length of the abdomen there extended a heavy bruise, in the shape of the letter X, in the centre of which was a large mark of bruised blood, at least six inches square. An attempt had been made with the axe to sever the head from the body, and three separate gashes, passing through the neck, the edge of the blade entering the floor, apparently to have been the finishing stroke of the bloody deed. Hellman was arrested, charged with the murder, but being wealthy, employed able counsel, and after 14 months' confinement, broke jail, and got off, concealed himself for some time in Pennsylvania, and finally in 1841, married Malinda Hankle, murdered her, cut up her body in such a way, as not to expose himself to the difficulties encountered in the murder of his first wife, and is now sentenced for this murder.

Sentence of Horn.

The sentence of Horn was pronounced last week (Monday Dec. 4th.) by Judge Magruder, in a clear, distinct and feeling manner. The culprit, on being placed at the bar, had a pale, haggard, and down cast look. Two or three times, immediately after taking his seat, he raised his eyes, looked at the judge, and then as if to hide his face from view as much as possible, lowered himself in the place whereon he sat and cast his eyes downward, in which position he remained until the dread sentence of oloudded law had been pronounced. During its delivery, which occupied about ten minutes, the prisoner's eye became full, his stony heart was evidently touched by the impressive solemnity of the occasion, and he could not repress the silent tear. Both the judges on the bench—Magruder and Paine—besides many others throughout the vast multitude who had assembled to behold the solemn scene, could not refrain from manifesting the deep emotions an occasion so impressive is calculated to inspire.

Horn was remanded to prison, where he is to remain until he has expiated that terrible crime of which a jury of his country has found him guilty.

THE STUPENDOUS ROBBERY OF POMEROY & CO'S EXPRESS OF NEARLY HALF A MILLION OF DOLLARS.

We have received the following particulars of this great robbery. It is the most extraordinary affair of the kind that ever took place. Much is yet shrouded in mystery, but time will reveal all. What will happen next?

From the Albany Argus, Dec. 10

Yesterday our city was astounded with the particulars of a robbery more extensive and daring than any that has yet startled the public mind.

The Iron Trunk containing the money and drafts sent from this city by the banks and brokers in charge of Pomerooy & Co's Express, on Tuesday was stolen from the deck of the steamboat Utica, it is supposed, after the arrival of the boat in the city of New York on Wednesday morning. The particulars are briefly as follows.

NOTICE TO EMIGRANTS AND LATTER-DAY SAINTS GENERALLY.

I feel it my duty to say to the brethren generally, and especially those who are emigrating to this place, that there is in the hands of the Trustees in Trust, a large quantity of lands, both in the city and adjoining Townships in this county, which is for sale—some of which belongs to the church and is designed for the benefit of the poor, and also to liquidate debts owing by the church, for which the Trustees are responsible. Some also is land which has been consecrated for the building of the Temple, and some for the Nauvoo House.

If the brethren who move in here and want an inheritance will buy their lands from the Trustees in Trust, they will thereby benefit the poor, the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and even then only be doing that which is their duty and which I know, by considerable experience, will be vastly for their benefit and satisfaction in days to come. Let all the brethren therefore, when they move into Nauvoo, consult President Joseph Smith the Trustees &c., and purchase their lands of him, and I am led to say that God will bless them and will hereafter be glad they did so.

We hold ourselves ready at any time to wait upon the brethren and show them the lands belonging to the church and Temple &c., and can be found any day either at President Joseph Smith's Bar Room or the Temple Recorder's Office, at the Temple.

LOST.

ABOUT six weeks ago a company of sailors arrived in this place escorted by Elder Wadsworth who had in his charge a trunk belonging to Jane Elizabeth Manning. Sister Manning was not here then but has since arrived and can obtain no intelligence of her trunk; it is presumed that some one has got it in mistake as there was a number of passengers arrived at the same time. The trunk is about three feet long and covered with a light red hair skin, with the exception of the back, on which there is some white. It is directed Jane Elizabeth Manning, Nauvoo. Whoever will give such information as shall lead to the discovery of the trunk will be handsomely rewarded by applying to this office.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan? Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr. James M. Martineau.

Inquire for Dr. James M. Martineau's Lancet-remedy for the cure of Fevers.

For Dr. James M. Martineau's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.

For Dr. James M. Martineau's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.

For Dr. James M. Martineau's Cephalic Saffor, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that in their curative virtues may be found the Good Samaritan; the true Philanthropist; the balm of Gilead; the Poor Man's Wealth; the Sick Man's Comfort; and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untrifling industry and immense research, and after having taught riper years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr. James M. Martineau is fully persuaded that he has now reached his long-expected goal; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by all future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of remedying and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

CHEAP BOOTS AND SHOE MANUFACTORY!

The subscriber would respectfully inform the citizens of Nauvoo and vicinity that he intends to manufacture Boots and Shoes much cheaper than has been done heretofore in this city. He would also inform the farmers that he will take hides and produce in part pay.

He returns his thanks to the public generally for the liberal patronage heretofore extended, and hopes, in consequence of his reduced prices to merit a still greater share of the patronage of those who wish to encourage home-manufacture, and labour rather than compel many of their mechanics to leave this city and their families and seek employment elsewhere in consequence of the Eastern work brought here by our merchants whose only object and aim seems to be to enrich themselves regardless of the sufferings of their own citizens, instead of bringing leather and having it manufactured at home.

His work will be made out of the best materials and workmanship not excelled by any in the city, at the following prices:

POSTER.

SPEAK NOT TO HIM A BITTER WORD:

Wouldst thou a wanderer reclaim,
A wild and restless spirit tame—
Check the wanton flow of youthful blood,
And lead a lost one back to God!
Pause, if thy spirit's wrath be stirred—
Speak not to him a bitter word—
Speak not—that bitter word may be
The stamp that seals his destiny.

If widely he hath gone astray,
And dark excess hath marked his way;
'Tis pitiful—but yet beware,
Refuse not to come with kindly care;
Forbid the passing lips to move,
Save in the tones of gentle love;
Though sad his young heart hath erred,
Speak not to him a bitter word.

The lowering frown he will not bear,
The yonned chidings will not hear;
The ardent spirit will not brook
The stinging touch of sharp rebuke;
Thou wouldst not grieve the restless deed,
To calm his fire or check his speed;
Then let not angry tones be heard—
Speak not to him a bitter word.

Go kindly to him—make him feel,
Your heart yearns deeply for his weal;
Tell him the dangers thick that lay
Around his "widely deviate way,"
So shall thou win him—call him back
From pleasure's smooth, seductive track,
And warning thus hast mildly given,
May guide the wanderer up to heaven.

LET YOUR SUMMER FRIENDS GO BY.

Let your summer friends go by,
With the sunny weather;
Hearts there are, that will not fly,
Though the storm should gather.

Summer love to fortune clings,
From the wreck it saileth,
Like the heron, that spreads its wings,
When the honey faileth.

Rich the soil where weeds appear,
Let their false bloom perish;
Flowers there are, more rare and dear,
That you still may cherish.

Flowers of feeling pure are warm,
Hearts that cannot wither,
These for thee shall bid the storm,
As the sunny weather.

FORGIVE AND FORGET.

Forgive and Forget! why the world would be Lonely,
The garden a wilderness left to deform;
If the flowers but remembered the chilling winds only.

And the fields gave no verdure for fear of the storm!
Oh, still in thy loneliness emblem the flower,
Give the fragrance of feeling to sweeten life's way!

And prolong not again the brief cloud of an hour,
With tears that but darken the rest of the day!

Forgive and Forget! there's no breast so unfeeling
But some gentle thoughts of affection there live;
And the heart of us all require something concealing,
Some heart that with smiles can forget and forgive!

Then away with the cloud from those beautiful eyes,
That brow was no home for such frowns to have;
Oh, how could our spirits e'er hope for the skies,
If Heaven refused to Forgive and Forget!

OLD FRIENDS TOGETHER.

Oh, time is sweet, when roses meet
With Spring's sweet breath around them,
And sweet the cost, when hearts are lost,
If those we love have found them!

And sweet the Mind, that still can find
A star in darkest weather;
But naught can be so sweet to see,
As old friends met together!

Those days of old, when youth was bold,
And Time stole wings to speed it,
And youth ne'er knew how fast time flew—
Or knowing, did not heed it!

Thought each each brow that meets us now—
For age brings wintry weather—
Yet naught can be so sweet to see
As those old friends together!

The few long known, that years have shown,
With hearts that friendship blesses;
A hand to cheer—perchance, a tear
To soothe a friend's distress!

That helped and tried—still side by side—
A friend to face hard weather;
Oh, thus may we yet joy to see,
And meet old friends together!

Agricultural.

From the Farmer's Cabinet.
THE HESSIAN FLY.

A few years ago I commenced the business of farming, more for the purpose of a pleasant relaxation from professional life, than with the hope of gain; and my fancies for the occupation, and led me into many experiments and much close observation of things pertaining to agriculture; and I do not know but it may lead me to trouble you and your readers occasionally with the result of them. If I suppose I could add any thing to that spirit of enterprise, which you and others seem to have awakened among the farmers of this day, or suggest an idea which a practical farmer might turn to a valuable account, I should feel gratified. In my pursuit of information on this subject, whenever I have found an opinion with regard to a fact—a cause or an effect, to be generally entertained by farmers whose attention has been called to the subject, I look upon it as entitled to respectful consideration, even if it does not at once command entire belief; it is worth a book of philosophical theory.

As you know, this is a wheat growing district, and our farmers may be supposed to know something of whatever concerns the cultivation of that grain. They enertain an opinion with regard to the Hessian Fly and its appearance, which is natural, and which my own observation has convinced me is in accordance with the truth. It is a big belted insect, which makes its appearance in the fall, when the mildness of the weather will admit, especially in that season called Indian summer, and its coming is easily discovered; when it alights upon the ground, it divests itself of its wings, and assumes the appearance of a large black ant and from its hurried manner, seems to be seeking a place of deposit for its egg; this it soon finds, either in the crevices of the ground, under a clod, or in the wheat plant; and not always in the latter, as is sometimes supposed. After the egg is deposited, the insect seeks shelter for itself in the earth, where it remains during the winter; and either it or its progeny appears again in the spring, to go through the same work of destruction. The opinion is entertained by some, that the egg deposited in the fall, remains to be hatched in the spring—but not so; nature makes better provision for her creatures, than to cause the egg to be laid in the fall, exposed to the frosts of winter, to be hatched in the spring—
The egg laid in the fall does its injury to the grain, then or not at all; its effect is then perceptible; and it is the re-appearance of the fly in the spring which repeats the evil. My observation has convinced me, that this is the Hessian Fly;
and that there is a most infallible remedy for its destruction—as certain as it is simple—the use of the Roller. A very little care and observation at that season of the year when the farmer expects its appearance, will discover its presence; and then is the time, whether it be spring or fall, to roll the wheat fields; the weight of the roller not only destroys the insect itself, whose size and shape prevent escape, but it destroys also the tender egg, whether deposited in the wheat plant or elsewhere. I have used the roller for six years, and I have never seen the effect of fly in my wheat; while crops around me have been partially destroyed by it.

Preservation of Apples.—In the London Gardener's Chronicle we find the following account of the mode of preserving apples adopted by a gentleman in Herefordshire. We are of opinion that it would succeed any where:

"He covers the floor of his cellar with hurdles, two thickness, and on these he puts a little straw, upon which the apples are placed without further care or attention, except removing all that appears to be faulty as he places them in the cellar; and he thinks that it is unnecessary to use any particular care in this respect.—
He has at present 110 bushels thus heaped up in his small cellar, two or three times a week, he gives a good wetting with fresh water, as much as he thinks will wet the whole of them. This water drains off through the straw and hurdles, into a well. In this way, his apples keep well until the time he usually disposes of them, the best to make him a good return after Christmas. At present the apples look as well and as firm as if just gathered, and I understand that, during the last ten years, that they have always kept just as well and as firm as now.

"How much less troublesome and easy of application for keeping large quantities of fruit, than storing them away in dried sand on shelves, or in boxes, or in any other ways highly recommended."

Sweet Potatoe Seed.—A correspondent of the Southern Planter, writing from Charlotte, Va., says:

"I will give you the mode of keeping sweet potatoe seed in kilns, by myself and others in this section. We generally put them up in the patch where they are dug. Raise the earth six or eight inches in a circular form as a kind of floor, sufficiently large for the quantity of seed you wish for one kiln; get a stake in the centre, merely as a guide to put the potatoes around, cover the earth with boards or pine bark, over this straw litter, then put on your potatoes, letting the kiln terminate in a point at the top; cover with the litter say two or three inches deep, then with boards or bark, throw on earth until the kiln is covered at least six or eight inches deep; over this throw potatoe vines plentifully, to prevent the rains from washing the dirt down, and in the spring they will open in fine order. I design keeping my potatoe for table use in this way the next season. Some cover their kilns with leaves or straw, and erect a temporary scaffold (or shelter) over the kiln, but I prefer the vine as they are at the spot ready to be thrown on. The stakes should not project beyond the top of the potatoes. I generally saw them off previous to covering the kiln.

The following discovery was, a few years ago, communicated by the Royal Secretary of Sweden to that of London:

"After roofing a house with wood, boil some tar, and mix it with finely pulverized charcoal till it is of thickness of mar-tar, spread this with a trowel about one fourth of an inch thick over the roof, it will soon grow hard, and defy all the vicissitudes of weather. Roofs thus covered have stood in Sweden over a century, and still want no repair."

Mad Itch.—This is the name given in the Western States where it most prevails, to a disease of cattle, commencing with apparently spasmodic motions or jerkings of the head, and itching around the nose and base of the horns. They will lick their sides and back, rub their heads, and the jerk or hiccup infuses them with wind almost to bursting. This symptom is not however always present. As the itching increases, the animal rubs more furiously, froths at the mouth, and finally, from 12 to 24 hours, dies raving mad.
Mr. Simms, of Indiana, after losing several of his cows by this disease, succeeded in curing the remainder by the following treatment:

As soon as the animal was attacked, he gave it as much salt as it would eat. In a few hours he gave from three fourths of a pound to a pound of powdered brimstone or sulphur; and in the morning as many salts. It is the opinion of Mr. S.
that sulphur alone would effect a cure, though he accompanied its action with salts. The cause of this formidable complaint, like that of milk sickness, in the same region, is unknown.—[Albany Cultivator.

New Food for Sheep.—Whilst I was at Geneva, in the autumn of 1837, I observed every one collecting carefully the fruit of the horse chestnut, and upon inquiry
I learned that the butchers and holders of grazing stock bought it readily at certain price per bushel. I inquired of my butcher, who himself kept a very extensive grazing farm, and he told me it was given to those sheep in particular that were fattening. The horse chestnuts were well crushed, something in the way, I understood, that apples are previous to cider being made. They are crushed or cut up in machines kept solely in Switzerland for that purpose; then about two pounds weight is given to each sheep morning and evening. Sheep eat it greedily, it must be partitioned out to them, as too much would disagree with them, it being of a very heating nature. The butcher told that it gave an excellent rich flavor to the meat. The Geneva mutton is noted for being as highly flavored as any in England or Wales.—[Liverpool Albion.

REMEDY FOR THE HOLLOW HORN.

A correspondent of the Prairie Farmer says. Having read in your July No. an article headed "Remedy for the Hollow Horn," and finding the theory therein contained, so contrary to the practice I have been used to, I concluded I would give you my views on the subject. For about 30 years my father kept a dairy of from 20 to 40 cows in the city of New York.—
During the last ten years of the time (say from the time I was twelve years old) I began to observe and judge for myself. The last four years of the next ten years of my life, I kept a small dairy myself; and for the last ten years I have been a farmer in this vicinity. For the Hollow Horn, we always used from one to two table spoonful of spirits of turpentine, poured into the hollow on the top of the head between the horns, and cutting off enough of the end of the tail to bleed, which may be done by turning the long hair upwards, and cutting off a quarter of an inch or less. I have known some persons split the tail (and cut out what they call the wolf in the tail, which I believe is all a phantom) put in salt and bind it up: all the good effected is by bleeding—therefore the less the wound the better.

I suppose soot and salt may be good,
I know salt given plentifully to cattle to be good in Illinois. On the Atlantic coast, cattle will not lick salt, though during the winter season we give salt twice a week with their food.

I never knew my father to bore the horns until he had first tried the spirits of turpentine and bleeding, and then bored the horns on the under side only, and only on the top when the holes on the under side could not be kept from closing up with matter.

I have heard him say, he never lost but one cow with the hollow horn, while his neighbours who were engaged in the same business lost many.

His rule was, and my practice has been, when a cow brute was observed with a sunken eye and a dry nose, (which are the sure signs of the hollow horn) to put on the spirits of turpentine and bleed at the tail, and have had unvaried success. The greatest difficulty is in not beginning in time.

Cattle that have been hard wintered, are very apt to have the hollow horn in the spring. It is a common practice with me if cattle do not look well nor thrive in the spring, to use the above remedy. The signs of the hollow horn are, in addition to the sunken eye and dry nose, more joints of the back bone being decayed, and the appearance (from feeling) of one are gone—also a joint near the end of the tail, which of itself is no disease, but the effects of the hollow horn. I never saw a brute have the hollow horn bad, without all these symptoms, but have seen them in the first stages with only the first two.

Never was any country in so strange a position as Ireland; never was any country so singularly governed as she is under the present Tory administration.
The land is full of troops, coercion is threatened, conciliation is promised, her garrisons are fortified and provisioned as for war, and O'Connell is persecuted, while sundry preparations are making which are an acknowledgment that something, at least, of the complaints which have given him power with the people and been the apology for his demonstrations are founded in justice. Excellent government! Moreover, the proceedings against the Repellers, ministerial and legal, have been a tissue of blunders from one end to the other. Now that an apparently tangible shape has been given to objects that long had something of a fantastic signatus like aspect, the progress of what has been pompously termed "justice" is retarded by all the force and acuteness of Irish ingenuity.

People on both sides of the water have long exercised their utmost ingenuity, sagacity, and foresight to discover what the Dickens (Charles of that name, if the reader please) the Government intended to do, and they are now as far from foreseeing the 'beginning of the end,' or, indeed, the end of the beginning, as ever.
Though the cards have been shuffled and deal and several tricks played, some of them very strange ones, the world is still in the dark as to the probable issue of the game. At one time all the Ministerial organs, professing as they did, to know everything, were found to be at fault as never organs were before. The sagacious journalists, who are believed to pick up small crumbs of secret intelligence beneath the table of the council chamber, had half a dozen different versions of the course which the Premier intended to pursue with respect to Ireland, not one of which glanced in the right direction. Really, Sir Robert, if, indeed, he were at all aware of his own intentions, treated these poor organs very scurvily; for it turned out that, notwithstanding the many positive declarations made, 'on high authority,' they knew no more than the common herd of daily and hobnobbing intelligencers throughout the kingdom. Even the mighty Blackwood, who is supposed to have a large faculty for seeing far into millstones, was egregiously at fault; and his grave article, showing how admirably the 'do nothing' policy would work out the object of putting the redoubtable Daniel hors de combat, was in a few days, rendered ridiculous by the proclamation against the Clontarf meeting. People then pricked up their ears, and discovered that troops had been quietly passed over until the green isle was full of red-coats from one end to the other. The Arms Bill was proclaimed, the prosecutions set afoot, and other magnanimous measures talked of until ultra-Toryism chuckled over the idea of immediate coercion. Blackwood then changed his tone, and talked of the strong arm; and the Standard, and all the Orange papers of Ireland, crowded loudly and fiercely in the supposition that the day had come when intolerance should have a full measure of triumph. But though time flew on with his wonted rapidity, events did not thicken as had been anticipated. Rumours there were of intended measures that would place barriers more formidable than even the ramparts of Paris against the movements of the people; but these turned out to be falsehoods, engendered by the eager wish of those who construed slight and remote allusions into immediate indications of what they ardently desired. The avidity with which such measures were contradicted at head quarters showed, at least, a desire not to be misunderstood in that direction, while the lengthening shadows that told with more certainty of measures immediately forthcoming, preached not coercion but concession.

A commission has already been appointed to inquire into the state of landed tenure; and, still more extraordinary, a feeler has been put out on the subject of a state provision for the Roman Catholic clergy. When we consider the past we cannot but feel 'special wonder' that such things can be. Mr. O'Connell gives himself and his party credit for having effected this change in Tory opinions, and he assumes that credit justly. Yet is that very Government, which has made such an advance in the direction which he has pointed out, prosecuting him for taking the only means which he thought effectual for bringing them to their senses.
He has worked a miracle, and they pretend that he ought to be punished for it. It matters nothing that the Roman Catholic clergy have refused the proffered boon; the wonder that it should have been held out is not thereby diminished.
Here, however, we find the Ministry giving a small taste of Radical justice after a Tory fashion. Guns, and drums, and bayonets, 'God, save the mark!' are scattered over the country in abundance; and treasure is expended as if the income tax were paid with joy and alacrity and sycee silver were to be shipped to us in loads, while one or two items of the grand total of justice due or promised, with a vague intimation that more will follow.

Full and equal justice is the panacea which has never yet been fairly tried by either Whigs or Tories. That granted, O'Connell will, even now, become powerless, though he will retain all the glory of having wrung the boon from unwilling governors: withhold it and there will probably be

'Double, double
Toil and trouble.'

Meanwhile, the miserable, mismanaged, ill-got-up forensic scene of the drama is dragging its slow length along, exhausting the patience of even plodding lawyers.
Line upon line have been prolix of blunder upon blunder. Truly, the Tory Government is well and faithfully served by all whom it employs.—Viceroy, law-officers, and witnesses. The policy of the great array of counsel retained for the defence, refreshed, if we may credit the Dublin papers, by large fees from the rich-foes of the Repeal Association, has been delay, and lot the Irish Attorneys, General, with all his eagerness, real or apparent, has played the game into their hands. After innumerable turnings, and windings, and motions, and counter motions, and notices, which forced the Judges to adjourn from day to day, lest they should 'eat their mutton cold,' the period allowed for consideration of the pleas expired, and Daniel himself appeared before the seat of judgment. He put in his plea of 'Not guilty,' engrossed on parchment, and accompanied by the cunningest move that he, or the host of lawyers who hold by his cause, had yet devised. The witness taken before the Grand Jury had not been sworn in open court, as, according to the statute 56 Geo. 3.1 and to the usual practice, they ought to have been.
Here was an oversight so extraordinary,
a blunder so palpable that some persons had not hesitated to jump at once to the conclusion—that Government have determined upon letting the prosecutions fail by an ingenious non-observance of legal forms. Be this as it may, the Attorney-General has a legal reputation to maintain, and it was necessary, therefore, that he should combat the plea in abatement to the full extent of his ability. He even demanded time to enable him to fortify himself with authorities. This modest request of her first law-officer was granted, on the stipulation that the defendants should not be prejudiced by the delay.
The Attorney-General, having got his forces in order, contended, manfully, that the plea in abatement ought to have been put in when the defendants were called upon to plead in court, and that the bench could not, at the last moment, legally receive it. The Judges unanimously ruled against this doctrine, and decided that all the pleas, which were exactly alike, must be received. The Attorney-General at once demurred, and called upon the travellers to join instantly, but, as their object is delay, they refused to listen to the voice of the charmer, and demanded compliance with the practice of the court, by which a four-day rule is required. The Judges concurred with the counsel for the defendants, and it was decided, that a four-day rule should be served, so as to bring the points at issue fairly before the Queen's Bench, where they will be argued this day. The validity of the plea, therefore, remains still to be decided on the 4th-murder. The Dublin Evening Post has the following on this subject:

The question to be decided by the Queen's Bench is, whether the Jury Act,
quod Trials at Assize, extends its operation to the Queen's Bench. The answer, which the learned Judges will give must,
we believe, be in the negative. If this should prove to be the case, as we imagine it will, Mr. Attorney Smith will have to begin all his labour de novo. But, in this case, he can't command his Symptoman task until after Christmas. Whether he will have stomach for the work time will tell; or, perhaps, it may not. Perhaps it will happen that Sir Robert Peel, seeing the sad work which has been made of these prosecutions, the undignified, spiteful, and ill-tempered manner in which,

to this point, they have been carried on,
and, fearing a repetition of similar blunders, which cannot be otherwise than damaging to his Administration, may issue orders to beat a retreat.

A DREADFUL CALAMITY.

The account below, from the Missouri Reporter of the 5th, has thrilled us to the heart. We can well imagine what must be the feelings of husband, wives, parents, and children, who were expecting relatives so dear from the east, and who are yet left in doubt whether they were on board this unfortunate boat. From forty to sixty human beings drowned, or frozen to death, and among these the women and children being the most helpless, are no doubt the victims.

This dreadful calamity, which the expenditure of a few dollars could have prevented, speaks in thunder tones to the Representatives of the Nation now assembled in Congress.

It must come home to the heart of every member, not dead to the feelings of humanity. The criminal neglect of Congress, heretofore, to improve the navigation of the Father of Waters, is now, by an act of Providence, made manifest not only to that body, but to the whole nation. If it had been the first disaster of the kind, it would be sufficient of itself to awaken the nation, to the absolute necessity of appropriating something for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi—but it is only one among a myriad of disasters, which, though not as dreadful and heart-rending, have yet been more calamitous.

Among the citizens of Illinois, who were known to be on board, and who are saved, are

WILLIAM D. HENRY, Macoupin Ills.
C. B. FISHER, Jerseyville, Ills.
T. S. BESS, Princeton, Ills.

A TERRIBLE CALAMITY!

On Wednesday, about midnight,
the steamer Shepherdess, from Cincinnati, struck a snag in Cahokia bend, nearly three miles below St. Louis, and sunk immediately.—The boat listed suddenly, precipitating many of the passengers who had reached the hurricane-deck, into the river. The boilers then rolled over the larboard side, which caused the boat to roll suddenly, separating the hull from the cabin, which floated six or seven miles down the river. The weather was intensely cold and a large number of the passengers—estimated at from 40 to 60, were drowned or frozen to death. About 150 have been saved.

The boat was purchased at auction, in Cincinnati, a short time ago, by Capt. Howell, for 3,000 dollars. It is not known here, whether she was insured or not. This was the first trip the steamer had made since it was purchased by Capt. H. He was drowned. The boat and cargo will prove a total loss. Some of the trunks and other effects of the passengers have been saved, and left at the store of H. N. Davis & Co.

The books of the steamer have not yet been recovered, and consequently it is impossible to ascertain with any degree of accuracy, the names of all the passengers, or the amount of cargo on board. One gentleman lost 3,000 dollars in money, and another thirty negroes. A gentleman from Nashville, with his child, was saved;
his wife precipitated into the river and drowned. Many of the passengers who were saved, were severely frozen; having escaped from the wreck with nothing but their night clothes. Some who were landed below, travelled bare-foot to the nearest shelter.

The Henry Bry, bound for New Orleans, started for the wreck, shortly after the accident happened, and her officers rendered to the survivors all the assistance in their power.

The Captain of the H. Bry, remained with the wreck, labouring to save all he could, until he was so badly frozen as to render it necessary to cut off a part of his clothing.—The ferryboat Icelander, was coming up with a part of the cargo of the St. Louis; and was of the greatest assistance to the passengers. She landed about 100 survivors. The Agatha, and the ferryboat Wagoner, were sent to the scene of the disaster yesterday. The question to be decided by the Queen's Bench is, whether the Jury Act,

quod Trials at Assize, extends its operation to the Queen's Bench. The answer,
which the learned Judges will give must,

not been sworn in open court, as, according to the statute 56 Geo. 3 utter brought up fifty of the survivors, and two corpses. The corpse of one child, about ten years of age, was picked up some distance below.

The bodies of two females floated ashore near Vide Poche, several children were frozen to death before they could be taken ashore.

The hull sunk so rapidly that the passengers had no time to save even their wearing apparel. They hurried from their berths to the hurricane deck, and those who were precipitated into the river, were exposed to the severity of the weather with nothing but their night clothes to protect them from the cold. The feelings which pervaded this community yesterday cannot be described.—The Shepherdess, is supposed to have had over two hundred persons on board; and many who were anticipating the arrival of friends or kindred, are left without the means of ascertaining who were on board, and consequently who have been lost. Many of the survivors are, thus thrown destitute, among strangers, deprived of all their effects, and without even their ordinary apparel.

A few minutes before the disaster happened, the mate reported five feet of water, but he had not passed half of the length of the boat, before the water was up to his shoulders. So sudden was the blow that a general alarm could not be given, before the hull sank. The passengers hurried from their berths, but in the confusion of the moment, many leaped overboard and were drowned, and others perished with cold. Dr. V. J. Fourcade, of this city, was among those who escaped.

The frequency of such disasters although this is one of the most painful that has occurred for years—shows how outrageously Western interests have been neglected by the Federal Government.

In the neighbourhood of one of the largest inland cities of the Union, a trading obstruction to navigation is suffered to remain, endangering the lives of all who pass that point, and hurrying at the same moment, from forty to sixty persons to a premature grave. In all our Western rivers from the head of navigation to the mouth of the Mississippi, similar obstructions are permitted by the General Government to lie undisturbed year after year, to the eminent peril of life and property, whilst millions of dollars are expended on the Atlantic coast to improve harbors which are not of one-tenth the importance the navigation of the Mississippi for any half dozen miles from the mouth of the Illinois to the Gulf.

We have been requested by the survivors to return their sincere thanks to the Captain of the Henry B. and to Mr. John Clousey, of the Island, for their kind assistance; the latter bringing them up to this city, and doing all in his power to render them comfortable. Springfield Register.

A FEW QUERIES.

Have your barns, racks, yards, stables, feeding troughs &c., in order, that your domestic animals may be well fed and sheltered? An animal kept warm and comfortable requires much less food to keep him in equal condition, than when exposed to the winds, rains, and snows of a northern winter. If you study economy, then you will see that all is right in these respects.

If your potatoes, turnips, or other roots are pitted or buried, have you examined them, to see that they are secure against frost? The best farmers do not cover their roots too deep at first, as they are apt to heat; consequently, they need looking to as the weather grows colder, and if necessary, more earth should be thrown upon them. Frozen roots for cooking or feeding animals, are not the thing.

Is every loose board on your barn and sheds secured? Have you no broken panes in your windows? Look about and see. If you have any of the first, take your hammer and nails, and make all sure at once. In the latter, use some glass and putty forthwith. A broken pane of glass will cost you half a cord of wood at least, during winter, and give you as many colds as you can desire.

Have you secured your cellar against frost? There is many a man—we will not say farmer, for such are unworthy of the name—who will labor hard through the fall, to get his roots and vegetables into the cellar, and then loose them all by negligence in banking his house, or excluding frost from the cellar. This is a miserable policy, and your wife will tell you so, if you will ask her opinion.

Are all your farm implements taken care of and secured against the weather for further use? Do you think it looks well to see your plough left in the furrow; your cart and wagon upon the ground, with your hay rake and your chains, axes, and other implements, where it would take a week to hunt them up? Every tool, when you have done with it should be placed where you can lay your hand upon it at any time, and every implement, where it will be secure from weather. Most farmers suffer much loss annually from neglecting these precautions.

Have you examined all your water furrows and drains, to see that they are all clear, and the water flowing where it should? A clogged drain or an obstructed water-curse, may do much mischief, if let alone during the winter. Surface water is ruinous to many crops, and injurious to all, when long continued. Leave them nothing to chance in these respects.

What preparations have you made for adding to your stock of manures? In your manures is your gold mine, more valuable than any of the Carolina ones; and you should be anxious to increase them accordingly.

When you cleaned out your yard in the fall, did you cover the whole with manure or peat, or even loam, to absorb the liquid parts of the manure, that so frequently run wholly to waste?

Don't be afraid of laying out labour in this way; it is money at compound interest.

Are your children at school? and what have you done to provide for them, and for yourself, the means of acquiring that knowledge so essential to success in life? On this point negligence is a crime; parsimony is ruin.

If you are able to do nothing else for your children, you are at least able to secure them a competent education.

The State guarantees the means of this; it is for you only to use them.

Destitute of education, wanting ordinary intelligence, the man enters upon life with all the chances against him. Let it be impressed on the mind, that in this free country intelligence is better than wealth.

What have you done to advance the interests of Agriculture in the town or county where you reside?

What to do the funds of the county state society? What to disseminate agricultural information?

There are few men so positively mean as a farmer, destitute of public spirit. The means of the intelligent farmer may be limited; but his disposition will be good, and that will produce its proper results in action.

He will do what he can, and no more can be asked. His influence will always be on the right side he will be no drone.

What experiments have you made the past year in farm husbandry? and if favourable, you should let it be known, that others may practice the same methods; if unfavorable that others may escape the error, or be saved useless expenditure.

Every farmer may do much in the way of experiment, to advance the cause of agriculture, if they are well and safely conducted, and the results given to the public.

There is a somewhat prevalent idea that the farmer has nothing to do in winter. This is a great mistake. If he has improved his time well, he has very thing right, he will have his time during the winter more at command than otherwise; but he will have no moment for idleness.

The improvement of a body and the mind will furnish a life occupation; and the attention bestowed will not lose its reward.

[ALBANY CULTIVATOR.]

CLIMATE AND SEASONS.

The Albany Argus after collecting various instances of the difference of the weather in various parts of the Union, in regard to dryness and moisture, remarks:

According to the usual laws of nature, it is impossible for a drought to pervade whole country, neither can we have a famine, so long as the cultivation of the soil is attended to. Local and partial scarcity may prevail; but what is the case of one section is frequently the gain of some more fortunate section. When the north is parched with drought, the west or the south is rejoicing in fertilizing rains. When the summer is cool in New England, it is frequently the warmer and more genial in Michigan, Wisconsin, and Ohio; and even a drought which would burn all vegetation to a crisp here, would not exhaust the crop growing energies of the black muck of the western prairie or the woodlands.

Their new and virgin soil is comparatively more independent of the dew and rains of heaven.

This is the chief reason why the great west present so inviting a field to the thrifty, calculating and industrious farmer. He can place more reliance upon the intrinsic qualities of the soil and upon his own exertions, and is less dependent for a return upon the uncertain events of rain and sun. We have known wheat ripen finely on the western prairie in such cloudy weather as would be in eastern states, on our thin and comparatively impoverished soil, give no fullness to the berry—the exceeding richness and natural warmth of the western soil, is a measure supplying the absence of a warm and ripening sun.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 24, 1844.

CARTHAGE WARSAW AND GREEN PLAINS.

It has been a matter of no small surprise to us, to witness in a number of the inhabitants of the above named places, such a determined bitter hostility towards the inhabitants of Nauvoo, and any, and every thing bearing the name of, or in any wise associated with Mormonism.

We have seen the ridiculous moves of some men, whose indignation we always considered was aroused more through the loss of office; and was more a matter of dollars and cents, with them, than any serious regard they had for principle, about which they pleaded so stoutly, and consequently all their parade and bluster, only excited our risible faculties. We were reminded of the fable of the fox and the grapes, and we shook our sides heartily, to see their enthusiasm and zeal and hear them cry "sour grapes!" We very naturally supposed, however, that when they had vented their splendid ebullitions, they would cool down, and come to their sober senses again, knowing assuredly that they had no just cause for their wanton attacks, and the boiling over of their fiery indignation, and wrath.

When the convention was called at Carthage, we pronounced it mobocratic in open violation of the constitution, and subversive of the rights of American citizens, and we were sustained in that opinion, by some of the most respectable journals in the Union: we then thought, and think still, that this meeting was got up at the instigation of a few designing demagogues, and disappointed office seekers, for political effect. At this we were not surprised, such principles are common to humanity, as the history of this, and of all other nations abundantly testify; but that they should be able to draw wool over the eyes of the community, so far as to make them believe, in any wise that they were sincere, and that the good sense of the people should be so far over come as to cause them to get up, and associate with a party called "Anti Mormon," is a matter of no small surprise to us, and we know assuredly, that if it had not been for the strong religious prejudices which are so much harped upon by men of little minds, they never could have accomplished it. We at the same time, however, are compelled to acknowledge, in confidence, that when there is a continuous tissue of falsehood, and misrepresentation poured upon the mind, without any just medium of arriving at the truth, or of hearing the other side of the question, it has a tendency to warp the judgment of even the intelligent and candid, and lead them to arrive at wrong conclusions.

This is the only palliation that there can be for any participation in these wild movements, extravagant notions, and lawless proceedings of any of this infatuated party. We never before paid any attention to this subject nor answered any of the fooleries advanced, for this simple reason, that they were so extremely ludicrous, so lawless and altogether so quixotic in their character, as we conceived would render the reason conspicuous to every intelligent mind. We have been asked sometimes, why we did not answer the gross and unfounded charges contained in that little anti-Mormon sheet, the "Warsaw Message," to which we would now answer, once for all, that there is no respectability connected with it. We don't wish to reflect particularly upon its present democratic poverty stricken appearance, for that is its misfortune; neither should we have found fault with its being anti-Mormon, if it was candid, and had pursued one uniform course, as all men have a right to their opinion; but when we reflect upon its vassalizing course, changing about like a weather cock; at one time, advocating democracy, and at another time contending for the Whig party, and against its former benefactors: at one time contending for the rights of Mormons, and at another time opposing them. We think that it would be too disreputable, and condescending too much for us, to pay any attention to it. With Mr. Grey, we are not personally acquainted, with him, we have no quarrel, nor do we desire to have; if he thinks that he is either advancing his interest, or increasing his popularity by pursuing his present course, we shall not envy him his laurels, but at the same time, shall take the liberty to pursue our own course. For the information of those, who may be misled by misrepresentation and falsehood, we shall now make a few remarks explanatory of our policy, and showing that there is no ground for this hostile feeling.

We have always been the unflinching advocates of law, justice, and equal rights; we have always contended for the constitutional, individual, and legal rights of all men; Mormons or anti-Mormons. We have always been ready to administer the law upon delinquents found among ourselves, as we have upon any other citizens, and we are at the defence of the world to prove any thing to the contrary. Why then this hostility? What have the Mormons done to give offence to any of the surrounding citizens? Whose rights have been trampled upon, or who has received any injury at our hands? We profess not to be perfect as a whole; but if any of our citizens transgress the laws, they are amenable to the laws, the same as any other portion of the community; no city, state, or county, is answerable for the deeds of one individual, if he be found a transgressor; but the individual transgressor is amenable to the law, and that city, country, or state, as the case may be, where a crime is committed, is bound to see the law executed. If then the inhabitants, or authorities, of the city of Nauvoo, have not as a body resisted the law, nor violated the constitution of this state, nor of the United States, against whom have they sinned?

Why this excitement, why this confusion and uproar, about nothing?

When the Carthaginian convention met to regulate some supposed abuses, what was the nature of those abuses?—a great number of the charges were without any foundation in truth, the grossest crimes were laid to our charge, and which the very framers of those resolutions knew to be false, and if they were true, it became those men who profess to be keepers of law, to resort to lawless measures and themselves become breakers of the law, on purpose to honour and magnify it. It would have been more wise and certainly not less prudent to have enforced the law upon the transgressors of it. One of the great difficulties was, which we presume was the root of the matter, that the Mormons were able to out-vote the other citizens of the county, and the great evil lay in the majority oppressing the minority. If the minority could have gained the day, then the Mormons would have committed no crime, and would neither have been guilty of horse stealing nor anything else. This then was the head and front of their offending, that they used their elective franchise. But then the minority were the "old citizens," here we again pause, and ask, is there any law in the United States, or in this State making a distinction between old citizens and those who may have more lately located themselves in a state. Is there any provision granting an old settler, two or more votes, to a new settler one? Are not the rights of a new settler, as dear, and as sacred to him as those of an old settler, the new settlers in this county have paid as much for their land, pay as many taxes, and do as much to support the county and state, as the old settlers, and more—the old settlers are American citizens and the new settlers are the same, and we have yet to learn, what it is that makes the distinction in grade or cast, between one American citizen and another. If the teaching of the old settlers has given them to understand that they possess superior privileges, the republicanism of the new settlers has taught them another lesson. Why then should they get up a meeting, purely mobocratic, for the purpose of intimidating the majority, or for entering into measures to deprive innocent and law abiding citizens of their rights? Who are the aggressors? Put the Carthaginians would have done, if boot on the other leg, and ask what the the Mormons had held a meeting, and passed resolutions to deprive the inhabitants of Carthage of their rights. We think that they would at least, have had a good reason to complain, and the Mormons would have published their own shame.

But we have passed certain Ordinances that are repugnant to the feelings of the people of Carthage. Here we would again ask, what have they to do with our Municipal regulations? Our city charter does not say, that any of the members of our city council shall be chosen from Carthage, nor that we shall consult them before we pass an ordinance, nor that we are in any wise amenable to them, why then must men be so officious as to meddle with those things which do not concern them. But we have passed an Ordinance making it criminal for a Missouri Officer to come to this city with an alleged process against any citizen of this place for any alleged crimes committed in Missouri five years ago. Does this injure the inhabitants of Carthage, Warsaw, or Green Plains; or in any wise interfere with their rights? Is it not enough that we have been robbed, spoiled, massacred and dispossessed of our inheritance by a lawless banditti a gang of desperadoes; but we must still have them follow as like blood-hounds, and by illegal prosecutions and vexatious law suits, drain our life blood? We have expended tens of thousands of dollars in this way, since our arrival in this state, and shall we to glut the revenge of a gang of brigands in the state of Missouri, and a few disappointed office seekers in this state cease to avail ourselves of the wise and liberal provisions of our city charter, which provides that we shall make all laws for the peace, well being, safety and happiness of the citizens? humanity says not all intelligence would echo not. The patriotic sons of Illinois would respond not and could the shades of the venerable Washington speak, he would say "It is better far to sleep with the dead than to be oppressed by the living." In all this we have not sinned.

Another ordinance made especially for our protection, and for the furtherance of the ends of justice, seems also to be very obvious an ordinance making it the duty of a Police serving process in this city, to have them endorsed by the Mayor, is thought by some that this will retard the progress of the law, and prevent the ends of justice. We would ask in what way can it do this? The ordinance does not make it the duty of the Mayor nor place it within his power to stop the issuing of a legal process, but merely to detect an illegal one, and prevent the inhabitants of the city from being imposed upon by designing scoundrels. We consider that this is a wise provision, and that it has a tendency to further the ends of justice by placing the intelligence of citizens in its legitimate channel, and thus affording the city Marshall, who is supposed to know more of the city than a stranger, through the Mayor, an opportunity to assist the officer in having out scoundrels. That we have a good reason for passing such an ordinance, no one who is acquainted with the history of our city can doubt. Our citizens have been kidnapped from our shores, time and again, and always under specious pretences, and the appearance of law. They are not all acquainted with the forms of law, writs, and processes, and consequently are liable to be imposed upon, and carried away by scoundrels, under false pretences, but this provision makes them safe, because all of them will assuredly know that if the Mayor's name is not to it, it is not legal, and they will be able to detect the designing scoundrel and preserve their liberties and rights. What wise man could think there was anything wrong in this? In passing this law we kept within the limits of our city charter. How different the proceedings of our neighbors in Carthage they assemble to go after for what? to preserve the peace or to make wise and judicious laws for their protection? No, but in a violent manner to resist the officers of the law, and protect a man in one of the most revolting, disgusting and immoral crimes. We will not say anything concerning our neighbors, but if the Mormons had done this, we should have said let them endure the lash of the law. Who are the aggressors? The Mormons keep the law, and are not found transgressors. Their enemies instigated by jealousy for fear they will do it at some future time forestall justice, become breakers of the law themselves, and render themselves liable to its lash, for fear the Mormons will do it at some future time. Oh wisdom, where hast thou fled? O! intelligence where hast thou hid thyself!

We now come to the neighborhood of Green Plains and we find a hostile company and violence, the cause of their wrath? A number of their citizens are guilty of and implicated in assisting to kidnap citizens of Illinois. A legal process is issued and one of the villains is brought before a magistrate and the crime is proven against him. The very natural supposition in such a case would be that the inhabitants in that neighborhood would be rejoiced that such a wretch was found out, and brought to punishment. But no, this is not the case. He is fostered and protected by them. They rise up in their wrath to avenge, what the wrongs of an injured and innocent man? No, but to avenge themselves on the administrators of law for bringing to justice a manstealer. Tell it not in Europe, publish it not in the cities of monarchs, lest kings rejoice and aristocrats glory in our infamy. Ye shades of our venerable sires! put on sackcloth, sit in ashes, and mourn for the ignoble deeds of your degenerate sons.

After noticing all these different subjects we will add a few words of salutary advice to all concerned. Would it not be much better for us as neighbors to live in peace? Will it not be time enough to rise against us when we do something wrong? We have injured no man. Then why this excitement? We have enhanced the value of property, and made many of the old settlers richer; we have opened an extensive market for produce; we have greatly increased the revenue of the country, and we have raised up a large city, where it was a wilderness; we have observed due respect and courtesy towards all, and have never been found the aggressors. If we let other people then without molestation quietly pursue their own calling, all that we ask in return is the privilege of believing and practicing the Mormon creed, which is every man's mind his own business.

A LIBRARY IN NAUVOO.

At a meeting at the upper room of Joseph Smith's store, on Friday evening, the 19th inst., for the purpose of talking over the subject of a circulating library, to be established in this city. J. M. Cole was called to the chair and J. Hatch, jr. chose secretary. A brief, but interesting address was then delivered by Benjamin Winchester, setting forth the propriety and utility of founding a Literary Institute in this place, connected with a circulating library—that such an institution would not only give character to the city of Nauvoo, but would result in great and incalculable advantages to her citizens, &c. Spirited and appropriate remarks were also made in behalf of the same object, by Messrs E. Robinson, Esq., Campbell, Nichols, Ellis, Cole and Littlefield. The most liberal spirit and sentiments were manifested on the occasion by all present, and more than a hundred volumes were freely offered for the benefit of a library, by different gentlemen.

On motion of E. Robinson, a committee of five was appointed to draft a constitution and by laws; and also to present resolutions, expressive of the feelings and wishes of those present, at the next meeting.

Accordingly, Messrs B. Winchester, J. Hatch, E. Robinson, J. M. Cole and Nichols, were designated. On motion of B. Winchester a committee of one was appointed to visit on President Higgins, to invite that gentleman to deliver an address at our next meeting; also Mr. Winchester was requested to favor us with an address on the same occasion.

On motion of Mr. Ellis, the secretary was directed to furnish a copy of the proceedings of this meeting for publication in the Neighbor.

Furthermore, on motion, an invitation was given to the ladies and gentlemen of the city of Nauvoo, to attend on Thursday the 25th inst., at 6 o'clock, p.m., at the store of Gen. Joseph Smith, to which time and place the meeting adjourned. J. M. COLE, Pres.

J. Hatch, jr. Sec.

Gen. Smith has rented out the "Nauvoo Mansion," to Ebenezer Robinson Esq., of this city, who formerly edited and printed the Times and Seasons.

Mr. Robinson is an accommodating business man every way qualified for his business, and having so commodious a house, stabling &c., it cannot fail to be a desirable home for the traveller,—success to him in his enterprises.

PROCEEDINGS OF THE CITY COUNCIL.

Granted by the city council of the city of Nauvoo, the petition of J. S. Weld, and 24 others, to have John Haven appointed second inspector of flour for the city; and he to give the same bonds, and be governed by the same regulations as the other inspectors.—January 13th 1844. And he filed his bond with the recorder, and took his oath of office, accordingly. January 17th, 1844.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

Captain J. Dunham and forty police men appeared before the council and were sworn into office to support the constitution of the United States, and the State of Illinois and obey the ordinances of the city, and the mayor, according to the best of their ability, by councillor W. W. Phelps, clerk of the mayor's court.—December 20, 1843.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

Granted by the city council of the city of Nauvoo, the petition of Benjamin Warrington and fifty-six others, for opening a part of the street called Mulholland street, as far east as the corporation line, December 20, 1843.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

An ordinance regulating a City Directory and Intelligence Office.

Sec 1 Be it ordained by the city council of the city of Nauvoo, that Henry G. Sherwood shall be authorized to make out a city directory and also establish an intelligence office in this city.

Sec 2 The said Henry G. Sherwood shall make out a complete directory, stating therein in alphabetical order, the names of any and every household in said city, with a convenient and easy reference to his place of residence and business, together with his profession or occupation.

Sec 3 He shall also keep an office for the purpose of giving intelligence or information to all such citizens, strangers, or others that may call upon him for that purpose, and still take especial care to obtain from the most authentic sources all information necessary for the benefit of the citizens of said city.

Sec 4 The said Henry G. Sherwood shall be allowed to receive a fee of not exceeding twenty-five cents from each applicant, for each information so given, as a compensation for his trouble in obtaining such information and for keeping said office.

He shall also be allowed the sole and entire benefit of whatever may be obtained by the use or sale of this said city directory, for the space of three years from the first of April next.

Sec 5 The said Henry G. Sherwood shall procure the printing of the said city directory, so soon as he shall be able to compile the same, providing he shall be able to obtain subscribers sufficient to justify the expense.

Sec 6 The said Henry G. Sherwood shall furnish the city council, mayor and city marshal, one copy each of the said city directory (providing he shall be able to procure the printing of the same), and also give any and all information in his possession connected with the business of the city at all times when called upon for that purpose free of expense.

Sec 7 He shall have until the first day of April next, to make out and compile the said directory, and shall correct and make such additions as may be necessary, annually, thereafter between the first day of February, and the first day of April, next following. This ordinance to be in force from and after its passage.

Sec 8 That if the foregoing requisitions are not complied with by H. G. Sherwood, the office shall revert back to the city council.

Passed January 18th, 1844. JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

An ordinance concerning witnesses and jurors' fees.

Be it ordained by the city council of the city of Nauvoo, that hereafter all persons subpoenaed and attending upon courts of trial, as witnesses or as jurors, in civil cases, shall not be compelled to testify, or be held in attendance either as witness or juror, unless they shall first be tendered the sum of fifty cents per day for each witness, and each juror subpoenaed. Passed January 18th, 1844.

JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor.

W. RICHARDS Recorder.

An Ordinance regulating Merchants' and Grocers' Licenses.

Sec 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that before any person or persons can legally sell or vend goods, wares, provisions, or commodities as Merchants, Grocers, Auctioneers or Druggists—at any Stand, Store, or Grocery, within the limits of said city, he, she or they shall first obtain a license from the City Recorder, for which he, she or they shall pay down, at the rate of one dollar for every hundred dollars worth of stock in trade, at the discretion of said Recorder by inquiry upon oath, as to the amount of stock; and said license shall continue in force one year from the date. The amount for said license shall be by the Recorder, paid into the Treasury for the use and benefit of said city.

Sec. 2. And be it further ordained that this ordinance shall go into effect on the 25th day of December, instant, and that the penalty for a refusal or neglect to comply with its requirements, shall be two dollars upon every hundred dollars worth of stock in trade, recoverable before the Mayor of said city upon proof as in other cases of violating city ordinances.

Sec. 3. And be it further ordained that the city Marshal, (whose duty it is to carry this ordinance into effect,) or any other person shall be allowed ten per cent, out of the fine for prosecuting violations of this ordinance to effect.

Sec. 4. And be it further ordained that the Recorder, at the city's expense, shall furnish a book to register the names of persons and dates to whom licenses are granted, with the amount of stock for which registry and license fee shall receive one dollar fee, and persons to whom licenses are granted shall post them in a conspicuous place in the store or grocery so licensed.

Sec. 5. And be it further ordained, that where the stock in trade is increased after the license is granted during the continuance of such license such person, or persons shall report the same to the Recorder, who shall be governed as in the first section of this ordinance, and claim the same proportion of license money for the benefit of the city, as there has been stock added; viz, one dollar for one hundred dollars worth a year; fifty cents for the same amount six months; and in like manner for all sums any length of time; and subject to the same penalty for neglect, refusal or non-compliance as is provided in the second section of this ordinance.

Sec. 6. And be it further ordained that the Recorder shall deduct from the license money, the amount which may have been taxed by the city assessors and collectors for the current year.

Passed Dec. 16, 1843.

JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

An Ordinance concerning the sale of Spirituous Liquors.

Whereas, The use and sale of distilled and fermented liquors for all purposes of beverage and drink by persons in health are viewed by this City Council with unqualified disapprobation;

Whereas, Nevertheless the aforesaid liquors are considered highly beneficial for medical and medicinal purposes and may be safely employed for such uses under the counsel of discreet persons, Therefore,

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that the Mayor of this city is hereby authorized to sell said liquors in such quantities as he may deem expedient.

Sec. 2. Be it further ordained that other persons not exceeding one to each Ward of the city may also sell said liquors in like quantities for medicinal and medicinal purposes, by obtaining a license of the Mayor of the city. The above ordinance to be in full force and effect immediately after its passage and all ordinances to the contrary notwithstanding.

Passed Jan. 10, 1844.

JOSEPH SMITH, Mayor.

WILLARD RICHARDS, Recorder.

Correspondence of the Baltimore American.

TWENTY EIGHTH CONGRESS.

Washington, Dec. 19, 1843

Notice.

A debate arose upon the proposition to refer to the Committee of Commerce the vexed question connected with internal improvements by improving the harbors and rivers. Messrs. Barnard, Wise and others, took part in the discussion.

Mr. Kennedy of Indiana participated in the discussion for the purpose of saying that he was glad the House had found out there was such a place as the west. But he should say to gentlemen from other sections of the country, as a Western man, "stand off." The west had become an empire of herself, and was strong enough to take care of herself. She would do so, and in her own way.

Mr. Holmes of S. C. continued the debate. The west, he said, was growing with a rapidity that no man had an idea of, but it was important for them to rely upon their own resources.

Mr. Wilkins of Penn., spoke also generally of the importance of the question.

Mr. Burdette of N. Y., asked what the decision had to do with the question before the House. What had the Hudson to the Mississippi? (The member from Indiana had spoken with disparagement of the Hudson.)—What had it to do with the Tariff? (Mr. Holmes had alluded to this subject.) The question before the House was a simple one to refer to the Committee on Commerce a certain portion of the Message.

Mr. Thompson of Ky., was disposed to enlarge the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, by referring the whole subject of inland navigation to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. Hardin of Ill., a new member and an earnest, zealous Speaker, spoke warmly for the interests of the West. The West had grown so much, and for interests so many, that she demanded and had a right to demand more attention to her welfare.

Mr. Bowlin of Mo., also made a speech in favor of the West, and the debate became very much one for Banks. Questions of strict construction, the tariff and internal improvements were involved in it. As the debate engaged, the contest was to which committee the subject should be referred.

Mr. Barnard after some remarks about the importance of improving the Hudson, claimed that the old internal improvements works belonging to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. B. was twice accused of being hostile to the west, first by the member from Indiana, and second by Mr. Brinkerhoff of Ohio. He was charged with opposing western interests—with being hostile to the West. He said he had brushed no such thought. He had said no such thing. He denied the accusation.

Mr. Brinkerhoff made the amendment honorable and received the disclaimer, but the other accused was silent.

Mr. Winthrop (of the Committee on Commerce) said he could not see why so much importance should be attached to the Committee who were to have charge of the subject. He was willing that the Committee on Roads and Canals should have charge of the subject or any other Committee. Mr. W. rose to repel the charge or intimation that the west had received no favor from other sections of the country. It was not so, and the roll of proceedings would show a truth he had heard some years since from a Massachusetts Senator, now no longer a member of that body, that there was not a western measure that had ever passed Congress which had not either originated with or been sustained by eastern votes. He had the authority of a western man of the Senate, for saying that there was not a western measure which could have been passed but by northern votes. When he would ask, for he had been driven to the question, had western interests been sustained by southern most? And yet southern men said (Mr. Holmes for example) and the mothers of the States, the old Colonial States, had been poisoning the west. Mr. Holmes when making this remark alluded to the tariff. Mr. Winthrop's reply to this position was happy, and of a character to show that in such a question the interests of the country were the same. And so they were in reference to works of internal improvement. The lakes and rivers of the west were all American. They belonged to the north as well as the west, and to all in common.

Mr. Douglass of Illinois rebuked Mr. Kennedy of Indiana, for the manner in which he had thrown off all dependence or interest upon other sections of the country. From the remarks which had been made to day by gentlemen from the north and south there was no reason for doubting the friendship of these sections of the country for the west. He did not lightly esteem such regard. The west asked only what was right and would give in the spirit she asked.

Mr. Wise thought there had been some bidding and tendering in behalf of Western interests during the debate, and he thought too, that injustice had been done the Old Dominion by some of the representatives from the west. She had given of her substance to the west. Her own dominion made up the west, and yet she was accused of being indifferent to western interests.

The committee here rose in the midst of a spirited debate, and the House, at half past three o'clock, adjourned.

Dec. 20.—SENATE.

The Senate was in session only ten minutes. The only business transacted was the reception of a resolution from the Legislature of Louisiana, in favor of refunding Gen Jackson's fine.

Mr. Houston introduced his bill for reducing and graduating the price of the public lands. It was read twice and referred.

Mr. J. R. Ingersoll presented a memorial from Florida, asking that the contested election case of Mr. Levy, the delegate from the Territory, may be taken up and acted upon by the House.

This called up Mr. Levy, who in a speech of some length expressed his utter contempt for the originators of the memorial.

The judicial merits of the question were debated by Messrs. Davis, Ingersoll, and others. It was extremely dry, and such matters always are. It was finally laid on the table.

Mr. Wentworth wanted to offer a resolution calling for information relative to the occupation of the Oregon Territory, but it was not read.

The next business was the resolution of Mr. Davis, instructing the committee on elections to inquire whether the members from the non distributed States, have been elected in accordance to the laws of the country, etc.

Mr. Davis, wishing to terminate the debate, moved the previous question.

Mr. Cave Johnson argued that the subject would go on course, before the committee on elections. This resolution being therefore unnecessary, he moved to lay it on the table. This motion was, however, withdrawn. The call for the previous question was then seconded.

The resolution was adopted, yeas 148, nays 32.

Mr. Bidwell gave notice of a bill to establish a National foundry.

Mr. Wentworth asked leave to offer a resolution calling on the President for all the information in his possession relative to the settlement of the Oregon Territory. It was not received.

The next business was the resolution offered by Mr. Barnard on a former day providing for the insertion of his protest on the journal.

The question pending was the question of reception raised by Mr. Dringhouse.

Mr. Stearns moved to lay the question on the table. This motion prevailed—yeas 116, nays 59, and carried the resolution with it.

Petitions being next in order, the dispute between Mr. Adams and the Speaker, relative to a petition presented by the former on Saturday, came up for settlement. The petition was from New York, and prayed for such an amendment of the Constitution as would separate that State from all connection with slavery.

The speaker had decided that the position came within the provisions of the 21st rule. But this morning, having had to examine the precedent referred to by Mr. Adams, he reversed his decision.

Mr. Adams then moved the reference of the petition to the judiciary committee.

Mr. Cave Johnson said he would object to the reception of any petition which asked for the dissolution of the Union.

Mr. Adams—It does not ask any such thing. It merely asks an amendment to the Constitution.

Stumping it.—We recollect the effective stump speech of Davy Crockett. A letter from Washington gives the outline of a speech delivered by a Mr. McConnell Member of Congress from Alabama. His competitor was a Whig and an unmarried man. Mr. McConnell in reply to him said: "I grant," "that my Whig friend is a fine looking man, thirty-four, and not yet married—look at him, ladies, and assure yourself I do him no discredit. But I do say, that men must be judged by their acts—a fine looking man just forty, and not yet married! Look at that picture," pointing down upon his competitor, "and now look at this!" (Here the speaker drew himself to his full length, and running both hands through his fine bushy head, gazed around and around upon the audience, and continued) "I am I think a pretty considerable good looking man for my age and inches, and I have one of the best and prettiest little wives, a straight and strict member of the Methodist persuasion, that this or any other country ever produced. And why did I get her? Because I possessed that passion which my more polished friend rubbed out years ago—yes, years ago—nine hundred and sixty years have shone upon him, and yet unmarried! When I discovered that the consent of her father could not be obtained—and he by the way, was a good old fellow, although a Whig—like a man, I entered beneath the roof of her parents, and like a man, I bore her upon my shoulders from the house to the bridal altar, chased by dogs, howling and barking, and biting to the very portals of the Church. A happy wife three little McConnells, and an easy conscience, are the fruits of the tender passion as I possessed it. If he can say as much, Felix Grundy McConnell backs out from the canvass—if not, let him forever hold his peace!" My informant says, that nothing could have been more effective—the ladies waved their white handkerchiefs in very ecstasy of delight—the men shouted and stamped as men never shouted and stamped before—and the country gave the eccentric McConnell an overwhelming majority.

NOTICE TO EMIGRANTS AND LATTER-DAY SAINTS GENERALLY.

I feel it my duty to say to the brethren generally, and especially those who are emigrating to this place, that there is in the hands of the Trustee in Trust, a large quantity of lands, both in the city and adjoining Townships in this county, which is for sale—some of which belongs to the church and is designed for the benefit of the poor, and also to liquidate debts owing by the church, for which the Trustee in Trust is responsible. Some also is land which has been consecrated for the building of the Temple, and some for the Nauvoo House.

If the brethren who move in here and want an inheritance will buy their lands from the Trustee in Trust, they will thereby benefit the poor, the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and even then only be doing that which is their duty and which I know, by considerable experience, will be vastly for their benefit and satisfaction in days to come. Let all the brethren therefore, when they move into Nauvoo, consult President Joseph Smith the Trustee &c., and purchase their lands of him, and I am bold to say that God will bless them and will hereafter be glad they did so.

We hold ourselves ready at any time to wait upon the brethren and show them the lands belonging to the church and Temple &c., and can be found any day either at President Joseph Smith's Bar Room or the Temple Recorder's Office, at the Temple.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan?
Where the true Philanthropist?
Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr James M. Martien! Inquire for Dr James M. Martien's Invaluable remedy for the cure of Fevers.
For Dr James M. Martien's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.
For Dr James M. Martien's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills.
For Dr James M. Martien's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.
For Dr James M. Martien's Cephalic Snuff, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that, in their curative virtues may be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having reached ripe years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr James M. Martien is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fond expectations; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by all future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

November 22d, 1843.

City of Nauvoo:

The subscriber takes great pleasure in calling the attention of the public, to the above invaluable remedies; believing that they are a medicine that will tend to secure the health of this city. That they act most mildly, and yet most efficaciously; in uniformity with the laws of nature; and that they are composed of mild herbs. Knowing from experience that no Pills possess more virtue in their curative properties. Their worth can only be estimated by a fair trial and by following the accompanying directions. The undersigned can produce a host of the most respectable testimony in their favor, and doubts not but a discerning public, will, in the use of them, secure to themselves, that highest boon of heaven—health.

ROBERT CAMPBELL.
The above medicines may be obtained in various stores in the city, and at his House, opposite the Nauvoo Mansion.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

CAMPFUR LOZENGES.
For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally, Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.
The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

LOVE NEVER SLEEPS.

"Love never sleeps." The mother's eye
Beats o'er her dying infant's bed;
And as she marks the moments fly,
While death creeps on with noiseless tread,
Faint and distressed, she sits and weeps
With beating heart: "Love never sleeps."

Let's not then bid and fragile form
Forget the tumult of her breast;
Despite the horror of the storm,
Of burdened nature sinks to rest;
But ever them both another keeps
His midnight watch: "Love never sleeps."

Around—about—the angel bands
Sleep o'er the weary souls of men;
With pitying eyes and eager hands,
They raise the soul to hope again;
Free as the air, their pity weeps
The stern of time: "Love never sleeps."

And round—beneath—and over all,
O'er men and angels, earth and heaven,
Whisper "Send!" The slightest call
Is answered—and relief is given
In hours of woe, when sorrow sleeps,
The least in pain: "Love never sleeps."

Oh, God of Love, our eyes to thee,
Thine of the world's false radiance, turn;
And as we view thy purity,
We feel our hearts within us burn;
Convinced that in the lowest depths
Of human sin, "Love never sleeps."

TO THE HONORABLE, THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF PENNSYLVANIA, IN LEGISLATIVE CAPACITY ASSEMBLED.

Your memorialist, a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, and now an exile in the state of Illinois, begs leave, most respectfully to represent to your honorable body, that he was born in the state of Pennsylvania, on the 18th of February, A. D. 1793, in Alleghany county, and township of Saint Clair; that he continued his permanent residence in said state until the year 1823, when he moved into the state of Ohio. In 1831, he went into the state of Missouri, and in connection with other members of said Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, became the owner of real estate in the county of Jackson, in said state; but by reason of the violence of a formidable mob, and the unwillingness of the authorities of Missouri to protect your memorialist, and those connected with him, in the possession of their rights, they were forbidden the privilege of enjoying their property, or receiving any benefit therefrom; that in the month of April, 1839, your memorialist moved with his family into the state of Missouri, into Caldwell county, and became the owner of real estate in the said county of Caldwell, without however being privileged to enjoy the benefit of his lands in Jackson county. All the lands owned by your memorialist and his brethren, in Jackson county, were purchased from the United States, for which payment had been made in full; the benefits of which payment the United States now enjoy, and have ever since the purchase. There had a large number of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints settled in Caldwell county, at the time your memorialist went into that county, as also many in Davies county, in said state. We commenced building houses, and improving our lands; building mills and other machinery, for our mutual benefit; quietly and peaceably enjoying our new home, and using much industry and economy, to render the desolate waste, whither we had been driven, a pleasant habitation for man. The toils of the day, were followed by the sound of the hammer, the noise of the plane, and the hum of the wheel, at night. Day and night all was bustle, all was stir; every hour of the day, and many of the night, brought forth the fruits of industry, for the benefit of the settlers, and added additional improvement, beauty and comfort to our new homes. Our social circles, however, were not unfrequently disturbed by the tears and wailings of some desolate widow, or the weeping of some bereaved orphan, bewailing the loss of a husband or father, who had fallen a victim to the violence to the Jackson and Clay county mobs. Jackson county was the place of our choice, and nothing but violence could have caused our people to leave it. Their hearts were set upon it, and all their feelings associated with that place, as the future home of themselves and their posterity. The location in Caldwell and Davies counties, was only made by our people, by reason of violence and lawless outrages committed upon them. It was always received by us as a place of exile, and not of choice, and in despite of all our efforts to cheerfulness, at times, the mind would be almost overwhelmed with melancholy, and we would say in our hearts, and often with our lips, what availed us that our ancestors bled, and our fathers fought for liberty, while we are as captives in a strange land? and like Israel along the streams of Babylon, we would be almost ready to hang our harps on the willows, and refuse to sing the song of Zion. O where is the patrimony our fathers bequeathed to us?

Where is the liberty they purchased with their blood? Fied! alas, fled! but we hope not for ever.

But the wants of our families would dissipate our feelings; we would engage in the labors of the day, and the toils of the night, with untiring perseverance, and struggle with all the powers of both mind and body, to render our families comfortable, and make our homes pleasant. But alas! this privilege was not allowed us. Our quiet industry, and untiring perseverance soon awakened the jealousy of our enemies, and the cry went forth, that if the Mormons (as they called us) were let alone, Caldwell county would, in five years, be the most wealthy and populous county in the state. This our enemies could not endure; and a regular system of mobocracy, of violence, and plunder, was formed to check us in our course to wealth and greatness, as our enemies supposed; and, indeed, they had some reason to think so; for an extent of improvement had been made in this remote and wild region, in the space of a few months, which had not parallel in the history of our western settlements; and I strongly doubt whether any where else.

This banditti of marauders increased in numbers and violence, until by device and stratagem, duplicity and falsehood, they got the authorities of the state to interfere, and aid them in their diabolical purposes; and the then Governor of the state, Lilburn W. Boggs, actually sent a large military force into the county, with orders to exterminate us and confiscate our property, or such was the authority the commanders of the military array, claimed, by virtue of the order received from the governor. Suffice it to say, that our settlements were broken up, our towns plundered, our farms laid waste, our crops ruined, our flocks and herds either killed or driven away, our houses rifled, our goods, money, clothing, provisions, and all we had, carried away; men were shot down like wild beasts, or had their brains dashed out; women were insulted and ravished; children were killed, while pleading for their lives. All intruders were vain and fruitless; men, women and children, alike, fell victims to the violence and cruelty of these ruffians. Men moving into the county with their families, were shot down; their waggon, teams and loading, taken by the plunderers as booty, and their wives, with their little ones, ordered out of the state forthwith, or suffer death, as had their husbands; leaving them no means of conveyance but their feet, and no means of subsistence but begging. Soldiers of the revolution were slain in the most brutal manner while pleading for their lives, in the name of American citizens. Many were thrown into prison to endure the insults of a mock trial, that would have disgraced an inquisition. This last part of the scene, was doubtless designed to make the distant public believe, that there was some excuse for all this outrage and violence. Among the number of those cast into prison, was your memorialist, who had to endure four months imprisonment, part of the time in chains.

To give your honorable body a correct idea of the origin of these scenes of cruelty and woe, we will here transcribe the preamble to a set of resolutions passed by these plunderers, at their first meeting held in Jackson county, for the purpose of taking measures for the expulsion of our people from that county. It is as follows: "We the undersigned, citizens of Jackson county, believing that an important crisis is at hand, as regards our civil society, in consequence of a pretended religious society of people that have settled and are still settling in our county, styling themselves Mormons; and intending as we do, to rid our society, peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must, and believing as we do, that the arm of the civil law does not afford us a guarantee, or at least, a sufficient one against the evils which are now inflicted on us, and seem to be increasing by the said religious sect, deem it expedient and of the highest importance to form ourselves into a company for the better and easier accomplishment of our purpose, which we deem it almost superfluous to say, is justified as well by the law of nature, as by the law of self defence."

Your honorable body will see by the above, that the reason assigned for the formation of the company (and this was the first that was formed) was the want of power, in the civil law to enable them to effect their object. Hear their own words—And believing as we do, that the arm of the civil law does not afford us a guarantee, or at least a sufficient one against the evils which are now inflicted on us. What were the evils complained of? Strange must be the answer, themselves being judges; the existence of a religious society among them; a society too against which even envy and malice themselves could not find an accusation, or ferret out any lawless impropriety, or one act which the laws recognized as criminal. For, says the complainants, we form ourselves into a company, because the laws do not provide for the evils which afflict us; or this is in effect what they say. If any individual or individuals of said society, or the society as a body, had transgressed the laws, had not the state power to lawfully inflict the punishment due to said offence? The sequel shows they had. What are the facts then of the case, our enemies held the judges themselves! They are, that our people had so deported themselves, as to be justified by the laws; claiming no rights but such as the laws guaranteed; exercising no power beyond the limits set for them by the laws of the country; and this was the reason why our enemies formed themselves into a company for our expulsion, or at least, they so say. If our people had been transgressors of the laws, no need then, for the people of Jackson county to form themselves into a company to drive us from our homes; they could have done this lawfully; no need of a company's being formed, all could have been done without, that humanity could have demanded.

By virtue then of the unholy determination, as stated above, our people were attacked, indiscriminately, men women and children; their houses were rifled; the inmates driven out into open fields or wild prairies; their farms desolated; their crops all destroyed; their goods, and chattels carried off or otherwise destroyed; men were caught, tied up, and whipped, until some died in their hands, others had to tie handkerchiefs round their bodies to keep their bowels from falling out; others were shot down; their wives and little ones driven from their habitation; and this often in the night, having nothing but their night clothes on; their houses would be set on fire, and all consumed, leaving hundreds of women and little children thus destitute and naked, wandering bare-footed and nearly naked, in the darkness of the night and dead of winter, in the fields and open prairies, without any covering, but the heavens, or any bed but the earth; and their condition so terrible, that they might be followed by their blood, which flowed from their lacerated and bleeding feet. Females in this heart rending condition, gave birth to children, in the open air, and exposed to the inclemencies of the winter. The consequences were that many sickened and many died. And if we ask, why all this abuse? the answer must be, because the people had not transgressed the laws; if they had, their persecutors would have punished them by the laws; but they had not done it, and for this cause they must suffer all the cruelties which the most inhuman barbarity could invent. The lands which your memorialist and his brethren had purchased from the general government, and on which large improvements were made, were thus taken possession of by our persecutors, and the same are held by them till this day, and we are forlorn the privilege of enjoying them or any benefit arising from them, I mean the lands in Jackson County.

After wandering about for a length of time, those that were thus unlawfully deprived of their earthly all and cruelly driven from their homes, got into Clay county in said state of Missouri; and again began to get homes; but in a short time, the same scenes began to be acted in Clay, as had been in Jackson county, and the people were again driven, and got into Caldwell or what was afterwards Caldwell county, and into Davies county, or a large majority of them, and here again purchased lands from the general government.

To give your honorable body a correct idea of how those who had been thus driven and stripped of their all, were enabled again to purchase, it is only necessary to say, that there was a constant emigration into the country of the members of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints; many of those had money, and they loaned part of what they had to those who had none, and enabled them to purchase homes. The lands soon began to rise in value, and the first purchasers were enabled to sell part of what they had purchased for enough to pay for the whole, and save themselves a home; some more and some less. There were few, if any, who did not in this way get homes, but were privileged only a very short time to enjoy them. We were followed into Caldwell and Davies counties, by the same relentless spirit, and by the same persecutors who had desolated our people in Jackson county, under the command of Major General Lucas, of Independence, Jackson county seat of the first mob, and the place where the first company was formed for our destruction. He was joined on his way hither by many of other counties, and invaded our towns and settlements, laid all waste and drove us into exile.

Lilburn W. Boggs, who was Lieutenant Governor of the state, when the persecution first commenced, and one of the principal actors in the persecution, was now (1838) governor of the state, and used his executive and influence to have us all massered or driven into exile; again taking all we had, and holds it till this day; and all this because we were not lawless and disobedient. For if the laws had given them a sufficient guarantee against the evils complained of by the existence of our religious society among them, then would they have had recourse to the laws. If we had been transgressors of law, our houses would not have been rifled, our women ravished, our farms desolated, and our goods and chattels destroyed; our men killed, our wives and children driven into the prairies, and made to suffer all the indignities that the most brutal barbarity could inflict, but would only have had to suffer that which the laws would inflict, which were founded in justice, framed in righteousness, and administered in humanity. But scourged by this banditti, without the forms of law, and according to their own declaration, in violation of all law, or the principles of humanity, we were doomed to suffer all kinds of cruelty which barbarity or inhumanity could invent. And they have gravely told the world that they deem it almost superfluous to say that their cause was justified, as well by the law of nature as by the law of self defence. Now, in the name of all humanity, what law of nature justified, or law of self defence required the infliction of such senseless cruelties? In so saying they show most absurdly but very little respect to the intelligence or humanity of American citizens, and in the eyes of the civilized world have cast a shade, and a dark one too, on the character of the sons of a noble ancestry, for they have virtually said that Americans look upon such cruelties as the acts of virtue and the fatherly chastisements of humanity.

During the whole progress of these scenes of cruelty, from the beginning, we petitioned the authorities of Missouri for protection and redress. In the name of American citizens, we appealed to their patriotism, to their justice, to their humanity, and to their sacred honors; but they were deaf to our entreaties, and lent a high ear to our petitions. All attempts at redress or protection were vain, and they heeded us not, until we were exiles in a strange land, though one (and to its honor be it spoken) where we found both friends and a home. But since our residence in Illinois, Missouri has followed us with the same relentless spirit of persecution. Warrants have been sent by the governor of Missouri to the governor of Illinois, demanding the body of your memorialist, and a number of others; for that of Joseph Smith three several warrants have been sent, all of which have been set aside by the legal authorities of Illinois; and yet they cease not their persecution. Our people are kidnapped, and carried into Missouri, and there insulted and whipped (as many have been) and cast into prison, and left to get out as they could. All this without the forms of trial. Missouri is by these brutal means endeavouring to make the public think that they have cause for this barbarity. But, yet we ask your honorable body, what excuse can be pled for such inhuman barbarity and brutal recklessness? Let me further ask the attention of your honorable body to the fact, that all the before described outrages were committed by a body of men calling themselves militia, called out by order of the governor for the professed object of seeing that the laws were kept, and their supremacy maintained. Such was their pretended object, and under this cover they put defiance to the laws of both God and man; of nature, humanity, and decency; and in these unhallowed abuses of all the laws of civilized society in the world, they were upheld by the authorities of the state, and actually paid by the state, for committing theft, robbery, rapine, violence, rape, and murder, with innumerable cruelties, painful to mention. And when we made application to the authorities for redress, we were insulted instead of receiving common civilities. The constitution of the United States provides, that this United States shall give to each state a republican form of government. Is it a republican form of government where such outrages can be committed in the face of the authorities, and yet no redress can be had; where all law is suspended to give place to cruelty, barbarity, and inhumanity? Let your honorable body answer.

Her statements in the national councils may attempt to plead excuses for these diabolical outrages, but all they can do is to stamp infamy on their own characters, and engrave disgrace on the urn that contains their ashes after they sleep. What, I ask your honorable body, can be pled in extenuation of crimes so barbarous, cruelties so infamous, and outrages so violent. What crime can any man commit, it matters not how flagrant, which can, according to the laws of the civilized world, subject his wife to insult, his daughters to rape, his property to public plunder, his children to starvation, and himself and family to exile. The very character of the outrage is all the testimony I think your honorable body can ask—that it was without provocation on the part of the sufferers; for if there had been provocation then would the transgressors have had to suffer the penalty of broken laws, but their punishment—if such it can be called—was not the penalty inflicted for the breach of any law, for no law in existence knows such a penalty or penalties. Why then all this cruelty? Answer, because the people had violated no law; and they could not be restrained by law, nor prevented from exercising the rights, which they, (according to the laws,) enjoyed, and had a right to be protected in, in any state in the union.

Being refused redress by the authorities of Missouri, to whom shall your memorialist look? He answers, to the people of his native state, and through them to the general government, and where can he look with more confidence, than to the patriots of Pennsylvania, the state of his nativity, and the place of the sepulchres of his fathers. Yes, your memorialist says in his heart, "I will tell my wrongs and grievances and that of my brethren, in Pennsylvania; I will publish them in the streets, high ways and high places of the 'Key Stone State'; that her statesmen may plead the cause of suffering innocence in the halls of the National Legislature; her matrons may arise in the strength of patriotism; her fair ones in virtuous indignation, and their united voices cease not, until the cause of the innocent shall be heard, and their most sacred rights restored." To your honorable body then, the representatives of the people of his native state, your memorialist utters his complaining voice; to you he tells the tale of his wrongs, and his woes, and that of his brethren, and appeals to your honorable body, as one of Pennsylvania's native sons, and asks you in the name of all that is patriotic, republican and honorable, to instruct the whole delegation of Pennsylvania in congress, to use all lawful and constitutional means to obtain for us redress for our wrongs and losses. Believing as your memorialist does, that the general government has not only power to act in the premises, but are bound by every sacred obligation by which American citizens are bound to one another, in our national compact, to see that no injury is inflicted without redress being made.

Weak indeed must be our republican institutions, and as contemptible our national capacity, if it is a fact, that American citizens, after having purchased lands from the government, and received the government guarantee to be protected in the enjoyment of them, they can be lawlessly and causelessly driven off by violence and cruelty, and yet the government have no power to protect them, or redress their wrongs. Tell not this in Pennsylvania, publish it not in the streets of Harrisburgh, for surely, the sons of the 'Key Stone State' will feel themselves insulted.

Well may the nations of the old world ridicule the weakness, and impotency of our institutions, a government not able to protect its own citizens! A government, it must be famous indeed in the annals of history, and a pattern to the world, which is so governed as to admit of the most flagrant abuses, known to the civilized world, and acknowledged by all to be such; and yet no power to redress them. Hear! O ye barbarians! Listen to it O ye savage! and hasten, ye hasten all of you, to America; there you can give your aversion by plunder, and riot in the blood of innocence, till you are satisfied, and the government has no power to restrain, nor strength to punish, nor yet ability to redress the sufferers at your hands.

From the acquaintance which your memorialist has with the history of his native state, he has been induced to make his appeal to your honorable body—a state whose people are noted for their civic virtues and zealous attachment to the principles of civil and religious liberty; a people venerable from the beginning of our national existence; whose virtuous efforts to the sacred principles of freedom, religious, civil, and political, have obtained for themselves imperishable laurels in the history of our country; a people whose colonial organization was based upon the holy principles of equal rights and equal privileges; a people whose national escutcheon has never been stained with the martyr's blood; a people whose statesmen, divines and heroes, labored in the cabinet, the desk and the field, to secure, and hand down to their posterity, in all succeeding ages, the boon of heaven, the sacred rights of freedom.

It was in the honored metropolis of Pennsylvania, the seat of the first colonial congress, when the principles of liberty were matured, from whence emanated the voice of independence, whose echoes rolled and reverberated, till it reached the circumference of the colonial settlements, and inspired the sons of freedom, until there was but one voice heard "Freedom or Death." It was there when the leaders and heroes of the revolution, pledged their lives, their fortunes and their sacred honors, to each other, to be scourged by a tyrant's sceptre no longer, until all they had, and all they were, were offered on the altar of freedom.

Not only were the principles of equal rights inscribed in legible characters on the flags which floated on her towers, in the incipient stages of our national existence, but they were engraven on the hearts of the people, with an impression which could not be obliterated. All who collected in her towers, or fought under her banners, could contend and fight for freedom only. Her teachers of religion, whose influence in the pulpit, and eloquence in public assemblies, wielded an overwhelming influence in forwarding the cause of liberty; did they use this influence in securing to themselves governmental patronage, or religious preferences? Alas! acquainted with the history of the times answer no. They were citizens of Pennsylvania, and the immortal Penn had inscribed on every pot and bell in the colony, 'Civil and Religious Liberty.' The patriotism of Pennsylvania's religious teachers was pure. They threw in their whole weight of character and influence to promote a cause which made others equal with themselves; for the glorious privilege of seeing a people free. Her heroes bore the horrors of war, not to sway the tyrant's sceptre, or enjoy a lordling's wealth, but to found an asylum for the oppressed, and prepare a land of freedom for the tyrant's slave. Her statesmen, while in the councils of the nation, devoted all their wisdom and talents to establish a government where every man should be free; the slave liberated from bondage, and the colored African enjoy the rights of citizenship; all enjoying equal rights to speak, to act, to worship, peculiar privileges to none. Such were Pennsylvania's sons at the beginning; and surely their sons and successors must have degenerated, lamentably degenerated, from the purity and patriotism of their fathers and predecessors, if crimes and cruelties, such as your memorialist complains of, go unheeded and unregarded. Honorable regard for the people of any native state forbids the thought.

In confidence of the purity and patriotism of the representatives of the people of his native state, your memorialist comes to you; honorable body, through this his winged messenger, to tell you that the altar which was erected by the blood of your ancestors, to civil and religious liberty, from whence ascended up the holy incense of pure patriotism and universal good will to man, into the presence of Jehovah, a sacrifice of life, is thrown down and the worshippers thereof, have been driven away, or else they are laying slain at the place of the altar. He comes to tell your honorable body, that the temple your fathers erected to freedom, whither their sons assembled to hear her precepts and cherish her doctrines in their hearts, has been desecrated; its portals closed, so that those that go up hither, are forbidden to enter.

He comes to tell your honorable body, that the blood of the heroes and patriots of the revolution, who have been slain by wicked hands for enjoying their religious rights, the boon of heaven to man, has cried, and is crying in the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth, saying, redress, redress our wrongs, O Lord God of the whole earth.

He comes to tell your honorable body, that the dying groans of infant innocents, and the shrieks of insulted and abused females—and many of them widows of revolutionary patriots have ascended up into the ears of Omnipotence, and are registered in the archives of eternity, to be had in the day of retribution, as a testimony against the whole nation, unless their cries and groans are heard by the representatives of the people, and ample redress made, as far as the nation can make it, of the wrath of the Almighty will come down in fury against the whole nation.

Under all these circumstances, your memorialist prays to be heard by your honorable body, touching all the matters of his memorial; and as a memorial will be presented to congress this session, for redress of our grievances, he prays your honorable body will instruct the whole delegation of Pennsylvania, in both houses, to use all their influence in the national councils, to have redress granted.

And, as in duty bound, your memorialist will ever pray.

SIDNEY RIGDON, P. M.

To the Editor of the Nauvoo Neighbour.

SIR,

Having had occasion to visit New Orleans a few weeks since, and being anxious to economize, I went as a deck passenger, and on returning from thence, it was my good fortune, to fall in with a company of Latter-day Saints, who had just arrived from England.

On sailing up the "Father of Waters," the mighty Mississippi, I was much amused at studying the variety of character, met with on board the Steam Boat: without entering at the present time, into a minute description of those, who formed the greater part of this motley company, I shall just relate an incident, that passed under my own observation, otherwise, I could not have supposed that in this "Land of the brave,"—this "Heaven of rest;" a scene so disgraceful and revolting, as the one I then witnessed, could have transpired in a professed free country like unto America!

The incident alluded to was so repugnant to a free-born Englishman's mind and feelings, that had not principles of a higher and nobler character, pervaded the bosom of the Saints, a general conflict must have ensued.

It was well known, that there was "Mormonism," on board, and a party of Missourian Farmers, and Dealers, took every occasion to tease and insult them, especially on this occasion, one miscreant looking fellow, armed with a bowie knife, and without any previous provocation whatever, went up to the berth of one of the Saints and violently dragged him from thence, at the same time, ferociously striking him over the temples;—his colleagues looking on, and joining in a laugh of fiendish triumph at their supposed victory. It was evidently their intention, by this coward and dastardly act, to have excited the Mormons to retaliate and being far more in number, they had gloried over their sacred prey, with savage and relentless ferocity, that had most likely inspired them and others, on a former occasion, when they drove an harmless and inoffensive people from their borders; robbing, plundering, and even murdering many an helpless, and innocent victim, which the perusal of several heart-rending "Appeals," and documents, inserted in your highly respectable Columns, fully prove and substantiate.

When, I would ask, Mr. Editor, is there to be a stop put to such proceedings as these? Can this be called "A Land of liberty and freedom?" when such unheard-of cruelty and oppression is practised, and no redress available?

But fearful of further trespassing upon your room,

I remain,
Sir,
Yours very respectfully,
JOHN HUSBAND.

Nauvoo Jan. 25th. 1844.

P. S. The name of the Gentleman, who was thus insulted, is Mr. Henry Needham of this City.

TWENTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS.

Tuesday, January 2, 1844.

SENATE.

The President pro tem, laid before the Senate the credentials of the Hon James Alfred Fenno, chosen a Senator by the Legislature of Maryland for six years from the 4th of March last.

Mr Buchanan presented the memorial of Jonas Preston and others; and also of John Ely and other citizens of Philadelphia, for indemnity for French spoliation also of citizens of Philadelphia for the revival of the Navy Pension Act of March 3, 1837; also of citizens of Delaware county, Pennsylvania, for a reduction of postage; also of Jonas Gleason for an increase of duty on imported baking and frying pans.

Mr Merrick presented a petition of citizens of Poughkeepsie, and another from citizens of Baltimore, praying a reduction in the rates of postage.

Mr Phelps presented the petition of the executors of Isaac Green.

Mr. Kives presented the petition of citizens of Hampshire county, Virginia, praying a reduction in the rates of postage.

Mr. Hannegan presented the petition of Jacob Olinger, also a petition in behalf of Simeon Kenton.

Mr. Woodbridge presented a memorial of citizens of Michigan, for a grant of land for the construction of a canal around the falls of St. Mary.

Mr. Sturgeon presented a petition of citizens of Philadelphia for the revival of the Navy Pension Act of 1837. Also, a petition of citizens of Erie county, Pennsylvania, for an appropriation for the improvement of their harbor.

Mr. King presented the petition of Geo. S. Gaines, late Pension Agent at Mobile. Mr. Simple gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill for the extension of the national road to Alton, on the Missouri river.

Mr. Merrick submitted a resolution which was agreed to, directing the Postmaster General to furnish to the Senate a copy of the account he caused to be kept during the month of October last, of the number of letters under each rate of postage; the number of free letters, and by what office franked; the number of newspapers, pamphlets, &c., passing through the mail during said month of October; and any other accurate information he may have collected, and not heretofore communicated to Congress, on this subject.

Mr. Hannegan submitted a motion, directing the Secretary of War to communicate to the Senate the present condition of the harbor of Michigan City, the amount heretofore expended on, and the sum necessary to complete, the works at that point, with such other information as he may have relative thereto.

Mr. Woodbury submitted a resolution, instructing the committee on finance to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting by law, the allowance of any claim, except under a special act of Congress, by any of the departments or bureaus which has once been rejected by the heads thereof; and also the allowance of any claim, without such special act, which originated more than four years previous to such application.

Mr. W. also submitted a resolution instructing the committee on finance to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that the annual estimates from the departments, which are laid before Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be accompanied by the written approval or disapproval of the President and all the Heads of the Departments, as to their necessity and amount; and that no estimates for appropriations be at any time submitted to Congress by any of the departments or bureaus, except such as, like the annual estimates, have been first laid before the Secretary of the Treasury, and are accompanied by a plan from him for means adequate to meet them.

Mr. Huntington, from the committee on commerce, reported a bill in favor of Edward Kennard.

Mr. Jarnagan introduced a bill to divide the United States into two military districts, in such manner as in the opinion of the President the interest of the service may require, and that one of the brigadier generals of the line of the army shall be assigned to the command of each of said districts.

The Senate then went into executive session, and, after a short period adjourned.

HOUSE.

Hon. Lucius Lyon of Michigan, and Hon. Wm. H. Hammett of Mississippi, appeared and took their seats.

Mr. C. J. Ingersoll moved that the House resolve itself into a committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the bill to refund the fine imposed upon Gen. Jackson.

Mr. Adams asked leave to present a report from the select committee on the rules, in order that it might be printed; but it was objected to, and the motion to go into Committee of the Whole was carried—ayes 105, nays 47, and Mr. Davis of Indiana assumed the Chair.

The bill to refund the fine imposed upon Gen. Jackson, was taken up, and was debated at much length by Messrs. Barnard, Dawson, Kennedy, Grider, Dean, and Peyton, when, on motion by Mr. Welles, the committee rose.

Mr. Adams, from the select committee on the Rules of the House, submitted a report which he moved to have printed, and made the order of the day for this day week.

Mr. Campbell, of South Carolina, moved a division of the question, which was agreed to; and the printing was agreed to, and the remainder negatived.

Mr. Davis, from the committee on public lands, reported a resolution directing 10,000 additional copies of the report of the commissioner of the general land office to be printed; which was adopted.

Mr. Elmer, from the committee on elections, reported a resolution authorizing the employment of a clerk.

This was opposed by Mr. Houston and Mr. Harpers the latter at great length, and before he had concluded his remarks the House adjourned.

In the Senate of the United States, on the 3d instant, no business of special importance to this part of the country was transacted, except the introduction, by Mr. Atchison, on leave of a bill to extend the time for proving pre-emption rights; and notice of a bill by Mr. Hannegan, for the continuation of the Cumberland road through the States of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois.

In the House, Mr. Hunt offered a resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution, restricting the election of President to a single term.

Mr. Barnard offered a resolution in favor of extending relief to the nearest relatives of the officers and crew of the United States schooner Grampus.

A Joint Resolution was introduced requiring the Secretary of the Senate and the Clerk of the House, to procure in all cases work of American manufacture for the use of the Capitol, when such work can be procured as cheaply and as good as the foreign articles. Objections were made, and the resolution was laid over.

Mr. Hungerford, of New York, offered a resolution proposing the appointment of a select committee on retrenchment, who should take into consideration the subject of reducing the public expenses of the various departments of the Government and report thereon. The resolution was adopted.

Mr. Stewart, of Pennsylvania, offered the following resolution, which lies one day on the table.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the House, (if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interest,) the instructions given to our Minister at Berlin, by which he has been authorized to negotiate a treaty between the United States and the German States or 'Customs Union,' for 'mutual reductions to be made in their respective Tariffs, with correspondence and despatches on that subject not already communicated to this House.

Mr. Steenrod introduced a bill making appropriations for the Cumberland Road in the State of Ohio, Indiana and Illinois, and the erection of a bridge over the Ohio river at Wheeling, Va.

Mr. Dana introduced a bill to amend the act entitled 'An act to reduce into one the several acts for establishing and regulating the Post Office Department.'

Mr. Cave Johnson gave notice of his intention to introduce a bill to repeal the duties on salt, and the bounties and allowances made in lieu thereof.

Mr. Milton Brown gave notice that he would, on to-morrow, or at some early day thereafter, ask leave to introduce a bill to divide the United States into two military districts.

Mr. Cary offered a resolution providing that the vote of yesterday, by which the House had rejected the motion of Mr. Adams setting apart Tuesday next for the consideration of the report of the Select Committee on the rules, be reconsidered. Some conversation followed, chiefly on a point of order.

When Mr. Boyd moved that the resolution be laid on the table.

Mr. B asked the yeas and nays, which were ordered; and, being taken, were: yeas 80, nays 87.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Some further conversation followed on a point of order, and the Speaker having decided that the motion was a privileged question, and was therefore debatable at this time, it was, by general consent, laid over until the call of the States should have been completed.

Mr. Rhet introduced a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill reducing all duties on imports over thirty per cent. ad valorem, with such discriminations below this maximum as purposes of revenue shall require.

Mr. R demanded the previous question; on which motion the vote stood: yeas 81, nays 40.

So there was a second.

And the main question (on the adoption of the resolution) was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. Barnard asked the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered; and, being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 67, nays 112.

So the resolution was rejected.

A resolution offered by Mr. Campbell appointing Mr. J. McCormick Postmaster of the House, was declared to be out of order, by the Speaker, on the ground that, by a previous question of the house to-morrow had been set apart for an election of a person to fill the said office.

Mr. C then modified his resolution so as to rescind the said order for the purpose indicated, he moved the previous question.

Mr. Waller moved that the resolution laid on the table.

And Mr. W asked the yeas and nays which were ordered; and, being taken were: yeas nays 76.

So the resolution was laid on the table.

Mr. Black, of Georgia, offered a resolution instructing the Committee of Ways and Means to report a bill, as soon as practicable, revising the present tariff, and imposing duties on imports on the principle of revenue only.

And Mr. B demanded the previous question.

On which motion the vote stood: yeas 92, nays not counted.

So there was a second.

And the main question (on the adoption of the resolution) was ordered to be now taken.

Mr. King, of Massachusetts, asked the yeas and nays thereon, which were ordered; and, being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 83, nays 84.

So the resolution was rejected.

Mr. A. V. Brown, in pursuance of notice heretofore given, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill, repealing the second section of an act commonly known as the appointment act.

[The second section is that which provides for representation by single districts.]

The bill having been read twice—

Mr. A. V. Brown moved that it be referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the Union, and that it be printed.

Mr. Campbell moved its reference to the committee of election.

The question having been taken first on the motion of Mr. A. V. Brown, it was agreed to.

So the bill was referred to the committee of the whole on the state of the Union, and was ordered to be printed.

Mr. Duncin offered the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question.

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be and they are hereby instructed to report to this House, at as early a day as possible, a bill to provide for the collection, safe keeping, transfer and disbursement of the public revenue, containing such provisions, guards and securities, as may best effect the objects herein specified, and to disconnect the Government from all banking institutions.

The demand for the previous question was seconded; and the main question (on the adoption of the resolution) was ordered to be taken.

The yeas and nays were asked and ordered thereon; and, being taken, resulted as follows: yeas 1, nays 59.

Mr. McDowell offered the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question.

Resolved, That the committee of ways and means be instructed to report a bill so modifying the tariff as to provide a revenue sufficient for the wants of the Government, economically administered, and with such discriminations as look to that object and no other.

And pending the question, the House adjourned.

NOTICE.

PERSONS wishing to get the Times and Seasons, or other books bound, can be accommodated at the Printing Office, on reasonable terms.

There can be obtained at this office, the first, second, third and fourth volumes of the Times and Seasons, also most of the old numbers, if subscribers should need any, to make their volumes complete.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, JAN. 31, 1841.

GENERAL COURT MARTIAL.

The Commissioned officers of the Nauvoo Legion are hereby notified that a general Court-martial will be held at the Masonic Hall, on Saturday the 10th day of February next at 9 o'clock a. m. for the purpose of receiving and acting upon the report of the committee of revision of the laws of the Legion.

WILSON LAW, Major Gen. Nauvoo city, Jan. 30, 1841.

NOTICE.

I take this opportunity of notifying all those that feel an interest in getting Wood for the Poor of the 6th Ward, that on Monday, the 5th of February, I shall meet all these at the Upper Steam Mill, to conduct them to the Big Island, as I have permission of Messrs. Law, to get all the Wood I want for the poor.

Come on Neighbours, with your axes and teams; for the ice is good, the weather is cold, and many of the poor are without wood; come on brethren and don't neglect the poor.

DANIEL CARN, Bishop of the 6th Ward.

We have had a few days of severe weather since our last, and especially on Saturday and Sunday, since which time it has abated considerably. The river is froze, so that teams are crossing, but it is not very safe, as numbers have broke through, but we have not heard of any serious accident.

A discussion came off last evening in this city, between one of Miller's disciples and Sidney Rigdon, Esq., which excited a good deal of interest. The Millerites hold the idea that the Savior will make his appearance between this and the first of April, while Mr. Rigdon contends, and clearly proves, that the prophecies which are to be fulfilled before the Savior's coming, would not allow of so short a time as is specified.

Self-made Men.—Columbus was a weaver; Franklin was a journeyman printer; Massillon, as well as Fletcher, rose amidst the humblest vocations; Niebuhr was a peasant; Sextus V. was employed in keeping swine; Rollin was the son of a cutter; Ferguson and Burns, Scottish poets, were shepherds; Aesop was a slave; Homer was a beggar; Daniel Defoe was apprenticed to a hosier; Demosthenes was the son of a cobbler; Hogarth, an engraver of pewter pots; Homer was the son of a baker; Gay was an apprentice to a silk mercer; Ben Johnson was a brick layer; Porson was son of a parish clerk; Pridoux was employed to sweep Exeter College; Akenside was the son of a butcher; Pope was the son of a merchant; Cervantes was a common soldier; Gilford and Bloomfield were shoemakers; Howard was apprenticed to a grocer; Halley was the son of a soap boiler; Richard Arkwright was a barber for a number of years.

A terrible Time.—The prevalence of such weather as we have experienced for the past two weeks, has come to be a subject, not only of remark, but a theme for the exercise of philosophy. One may well enquire, what has become of the Commercial Community, and what are the uses of navigation, if weather, forbidding the opening of a vessel's hatch, or the discharge of a single bale or box of goods, is thus to continue. We do not deem that such a 'terrible state' as is indicated by mud knee deep, and rain in torrents upon our city, can but have a disastrous influence upon every thing.

How can the arts and sciences flourish? How can the action of thought go on? How must love prosper? What are the prospects of social life or amusement? The matter assumes a most serious aspect, and calls upon the energy that man, in his best moods can possibly possess. [N. Orleans, Dec. 23.]

A SUPERB ARTICLE.—A very curious and superb article was exhibited at the recent Fair of the American Institute, at New York. It was an Ottoman, to all appearances, but on a lady attempting to sit upon it, it flew open, the cushion settled down, and it became a superb armed chair.

Touching a spring, up flew a reading desk, and a gilded branch for candles. Touching another spring the desk disappeared, and lo! a dressing mirror presented itself, reflecting back the lovely features which looked into it. But rise a moment while we smooth the cushion. Another spring is touched, and now it is a bed fit for a princess to repose on! As the 'Brother Jonathan' observed, 'it was a manufactured coquette, done in silk and mahogany, changeable as the wind, and beautiful in every change.'—St. Louis Reporter.

POETICAL RECOLLECTIONS OF THE CITY OF LONDON.—In St. Giles' church lies Chapman, the earliest and best translator of Homer, and Andrew Marvel, the wit, the poet, and patriot, whose poverty Charles II. could not bribe. Who would suppose the Borough was the most classical ground in the metropolis? and yet it undoubtedly is so.—The Globe theatre was there, for which Shakespeare wrote his plays. On the Borough side of the river, still called Bankside, in the same lodgings and having the same wretched, lived Beaumont and Fletcher.

In the Borough, also, at St. Saviour's, lie Fletcher and Massinger in one grave. In the same church lies Chaucer's cotemporary, Gower; and from an inn in the Borough, the existence of which is still boasted, Chaucer and his pilgrims set out on their famous route to Canterbury.

Who would expect to find any thing poetical in East Smithfield? Yet there was born the most poetical of poets, Spencer. Pope was born in a street no less anti-poetical than Lombard-street, and so was Grey in Cornhill, Milton was born in Bread street, Chopside, and the presence of this great poet and patriot has given happy memories to many parts of London. He lived in Fleet street, in Aldersgate street, in Jewin street, in Barbican, in Holborn, and in Scotland yard, and he died in the Artillery-walk, Bunhill-fields, and was buried in St. Giles's, Cripplegate. Ben Johnson was born in Marshborn-lane, near Charing cross. In Brook street Holborn, died by poison Thomas Chatterton, 'the sleepless boy, who perished in his pride.' He was buried in the work-house in Shoe-lane. In Southampton-row, Holborn, Cowper, was fellow clerk to an attorney, with the future Lord Chancellor Thurlow. In Bolt-court lived Dr. Johnson. Butler lived in Rose street, Covent-garden, church-yard, where Peter Pindar followed him. Dryden lived and died in Gerrard street Soho; and Voltaire lodged while in London, at the sign of the White Puke, in Maiden-lane Covent-garden.

Thus it is seen that let our footsteps wander where they may in this great city, the memory of the 'illustrious dead,' is around us.—London Weekly Dispatch.

ALMOST PERPETUAL MOTION.—We copied a paragraph recently describing a twelve month clock exhibited at the Fair of the New York Institute, the invention of Mr. Crane. We possess a townsman, whose powers of invention in this line of art, far surpasses the ingenuity of Mr. Crane. Francis Stein, clock and watch maker in Meeting street, opposite the United States Court House, had manufactured in Charleston, only a year ago, a clock that ran for one year without winding up; this clock was its own pendulum, and gave on its face, the times at London, Paris and Charleston. It was raffled out for sixty chances, at five dollars each, and is now in England.

Mr. Stein is working at present on a clock which is moved by a spring, and can also be propelled by weight; it has only four wheels, and its mechanism is very simple; it makes only 4-3-4 revolutions during the term of ten years, and need not be wound up in that time. Mr. Stein avers, that if he puts an additional wheel into his clock with one hundred teeth, it will go one hundred years without being wound up, and nevertheless the whole clock wants only five pounds to be kept going.

Mr. Stein, will have a clock of the above description, ready in four months time, and will give all friends of curious mechanism, an opportunity to judge for themselves.—[Charleston Patriot.]

Curious Geological Fact.—Professor Colcroft in one of his interesting

letters to the N. Y. Commercial Advertiser, mentions the following fact, discovered during his late tour through the passage of the Alleghany Mountains, on his route over the Cumberland road, to Wheeling, Va.

'The geological structure of this section of country, from water to water, is not without an impressive lesson. In rising from the Chesapeake waters, the stratified rocks, are lifted up, pointing west towards the Alleghany, and after crossing the summit, they point east, or directly contrary, as the two sides of a house, and leave the inevitable conclusion that the Alleghany, have been lifted by a literal rent as it were.

It is in this way, the granites and their congeners have been raised up into their present elevation.'

DISASTERS ON LAKE ERIE FOR 1840.—The Buffalo Commercial gives a list of disasters on the Lake during the season of navigation, which includes fourteen ships, brigs, and schooners, one propeller, and one ordinary steamer; all lost in whole or in part, or much damaged in hull and cargo.

The loss of life was from the schr. 'Erie,' at Michigan City, in April, of the Garduer, and five men; and from the schr. South America, on 15th October, Captain Bradley, and five others.

'Father what do Printers live on?' 'Why, my child?' 'You said you had not paid him, for two or three years, and yet you have his paper every week?' 'Take the child out of the room; what does he know about right and wrong.'

An Old Mail Robber.—The Alton Telegraph, of the 16th instant says: 'At the present term of the United States District Court, John Wingate, late post-master at Rocking Cave, in Harden county, Ill., was indicted for an alleged robbery of the mail. The accused is 73 years of age.

THE PORTUGUESE IN INDIA.—The Portuguese, as a naturalized foreigner, seems to follow the Parsee, yet few can afford characteristics more widely differing. The former may be known by his sallow countenance, slovenly gait, and mimicry of European fashion. His garments are the worst shaped things imaginable; and where colour is admitted, it is of the gaudiest tint; he affects a swagger, and desires to pass as a man of style and taste. Nothing can be more dirty and despicable than the Portuguese of the lower order, nothing more absurd and comical than the affected dean of the upper.

The Portuguese loves society and music, dancing and festivity; he is troublesome when holding positions of authority, and offensive in his self-importance when invested with power.

Among the natives of India generally, the Portuguese is held in contempt, and considered capable of all sorts of depravity and wickedness. That he is weak and degenerate is certain, while all that energy and talent which originated the Portuguese Government in India wholly lost.

The Portuguese encourage priestcraft, while their religious teachers place their foot upon the necks of the laymen, and, constraining a very sufficient contribution, live in great content and comfort.

The Portuguese seat of Government is beautifully situated, and adorned with palaces and churches worthy the great city, founded by the noble-hearted Albuquerque; but the towns which once equally marked their conquest, are overgrown with brambles, while the glossy snake glides among their tombs, and the timid songster of the woods shelters his bright plumage among the rich foliage tangled alike round hall and bower.

The Portuguese woman, pretty when young, becomes coarse both in form and nature when advanced in age. She loves gaudy colours, the glare of feasts, the insense of admiration. The better class affect sentiment, poetry, and taste, but it is to be feared are very unfemininely deficient in all these, if any opinion may be formed from the alliances that are often considered the most eligible, from their favourite songs, and the striking contrasts adopted in costume.

The Portuguese, however offensive he becomes when a ruler, weak he is as a diplomatist, ridiculous as a beau, ignorant as a priest, and useless generally as a member of the native community of India, is yet admirable as a cook; and although his deficiency in cleanliness and his love of potent liquors detract somewhat from his general merits, yet it must be admitted that the European gastronomist in India, is materially a debtor to the Portuguese; unhappily, in this sphere of action his usefulness ends, and with it his claim to our attention.

Coffee.—This bitter beverage, so well liked by ourselves and all whom we know, and so generally used in every civilized country, was first introduced into France, so says an old work by an em-bassador from the Porte, in 1660. It is stated that this Turkish Ambassador was a man of exceeding politeness, wit, and gallantry, and that notwithstanding he had so many wives at home, he was a great favorite with the leading fashionable women of Paris. When visited by them he gave them coffee to drink, and for politeness sake the black and bitter beverage was drunk, when a taste was acquired for it among the lady nobility of Paris which soon extended itself to all classes. It was in 1676 that Coffee Houses were first established in Paris. At this period intemperance prevailed among the French to a fearful extent. It was common, parties of both gentlemen, to visit public places, for the express purpose of drinking themselves to drunkenness. Louis XIV in vain exerted himself to put down this practice, but what he with all his power failed to effect, the Coffee House succeeded in.

The Cabot's or drinking houses, were deserted by men of rank and letters—the Coffee Houses became the place of their resort, and very soon their example was imitated by men of all classes. Thus did Coffee achieve a victory over a vicious practice, and to a very great extent save the French population from that degradation to which they are first hurrying. Well may they thank the man of many virtues for introducing Coffee to their notice.

Since that time the use of coffee has spread all over the land. The English soon became consumers of it, and it is now one of the most important articles in commerce that we know of. Its rise in price frequently reduces to beggary, improvements in making it to drink, have been so great, that when well prepared, it loses all that was disagreeable when the Turkish Ambassador first gave it to the French Ladies, and its consumption is now so great, that from the latest accounts, in Europe, 150,000,000 of pounds are annually consumed. What is consumed in America we know not, but as it is used more or less in every family, the consumption must be very large—falling very little short of the above.

(For the Neighbor.)
MISSOURI.
BY MISS K. K. KNOW.

What ails thee, Oh! Missouri! that thy face should gather blackness, and why are thy features so terribly distorted?

Rottenness has reared upon thy vitals—corruption is preying upon thy inward parts, and the breath of thy life is full of destructive contagion.

What, meanest thou shaking, and why art thou terrified? Thou hast become like Belshazzar. Mene, mene, tekel, upharin, is indeed written against thee; but it is the work of thine own hand—the characters upon thy wall, ago of thine own inscription, and wherefore dost thou tremble?

Wouldst thou know the interpretation thereof? Hast thou sought for a Daniel to declare it unto thee? Verily, one greater than a Daniel was in thy midst; but thou hast butchered the saints, and hast hunted the prophets like Ahab of old.

Thou hast extinguished the light of thy own glory—thou hast plucked from thy head the crown of honor—thou hast divested thyself of the robe of respectability—thou hast thrust from thine own bosom, the veins that flowed with virtue and integrity.

Thou hast violated the laws of our sacred constitution—thou hast unsheathed the sword against the dearest national rights, by rising up against thine own citizens, and maintaining thy soil with the blood of those that legally inherited it.

When thou hadst torn from helpless innocence its rightful protectors, thou didst pollute the holy sanctuary of female virtue, and barbarously trample upon the most sacred gems of domestic felicity.

The effort, the daughters of Columbia count thee a reproach, and blush with indignation at the mention of thy name.

Thou hast become an ignominious stain on the escutcheon of a noble, free and independent Republic—thou art a sink in the nostrils of a Goddess of Liberty.

Thou art fallen—thou art fallen beneath the weight of thine own unhalloved deeds, and thine iniquities are preying as a heavy load upon thee.

But although thy glory has departed—though thou hast gone down like a star that is not forever thy memory will not be erased—thou wilt so had in remembrance even until the saints of God shall forget that the way to the celestial kingdom is 'through great tribulation.'

Thou shalt be severed from the body of the Union, like a mortified member—though the lion from the thicket should devour thee; for thy doings will be perpetuated; mention will be made of them by the generations to come.

Thou art already associated with Herod, Ness to and the 'bloody Inquisition'—thy name has become a synonym with oppression, cruelty, treachery and murder.

Thou wilt rank high with the history of righteousness and the vipers of innocent blood—the hosts of tyrants are waiting beneath to meet thee at thy coming.

O ye wise legislators! Ye executives of the nation! Ye distributors of justice! Ye advocates of equal rights! Arise and redress the wrongs of an innocent people, and redeem the cause of insulted liberty.

Let not the contagious spirit of corruption wither the sacred wreath that encircles you, and spread a cloud of darkness over the glory of your star-spangled banner.

Let the monarchs of the earth should have you in derision—let you should be weighed in the balance with the heathen nations, and should be found wanting.

Let the arm of the Lord should be revealed in judgment against you—let an arrow of vengeance from the Almighty should pierce the rotten fabric of a once sheltering constitution, and you boasted confidence become like an oak dismembered of its branches, whose shattered trunk is torn piecemeal by the uprising of the tempest.

For the cries of the widow and fatherless—the groans of the oppressed, and the prayers of the suffering exile, have come up before the Lord God of Hosts, who brought our pilgrim fathers across the boisterous ocean, and raised up a Washington to break the yoke of foreign oppression.

TO PROTECT PLANTS IN WINTER.—At a late meeting of the Horticultural Society in Paris, M. Victor Paquet, made an interesting communication, relative to a mode of protecting, on the open ground, delicate plants from frost in winter. The branches are to be tied together, and it is necessary, two sticks are to be placed over the ground, round the plant, and a sack, or other covering, is to be placed over the whole. This covering is to be made thoroughly wet, so that it may be frozen at the first frost. The frozen surface, not admitting within the interior, a cold so intense as itself, the plant is in a comparatively warm temperature.

GRUB IN THE HEAD OF SHEEP.—A Correspondent of the Albany Cultivator says, "What will cure a sheep that has what is called the grub in the head; or what is still better, what will prevent that difficulty? The symptoms are, ears lop, head droops, bloody watery matter from the nose, in a few days scouring, then the loss of their limbs, and they will eat for some days after they are unable to rise; and lie on their broadside. We are getting into the wool business pretty well in this town, and have lost more sheep from the grub than from any other disease; sixteen grubs have been found in the head of one sheep."

The grub in the head of a sheep is the larva, or maggot of a fly, which deposits its eggs in the nose, generally in the month of August. The eggs soon hatch, and the young maggot soon makes its way up into the cavities called the frontal sinuses, where it attains its growth, causing constant irritation and disfigurement, and not infrequently death. Arrived at its growth, it falls to the earth, enters, and in a short time emerges a perfect insect or fly, ready to commence the career of reproduction and destruction. We formerly lost many sheep from the grub, and could find no cure for them, or but very partial ones, after it became evident they were diseased.

Our course was preventive. At the time the fly makes its appearance, which is easily known by their exhibiting great alarm, running from one part of the field to another, with noses close to the ground, we caught our sheep, and with a wooden spatula or flat stick, rubbed the nose with tar. We then placed tar on the bottom of our gutting troughs, over which the salt was sprinkled, and this brought their noses frequently in contact with the tar. This course we found a great preventive. Sheep, during the period they are exposed to the attacks of the fly, should have access to a ploughed field, or if such is not convenient, a few furrows should occasionally be opened in their pastures for their benefit. Inhaling the dust, or rubbing their noses it, renders the mucus disagreeable to the fly, or enables the sheep to expel the larva when deposited. With these precautions, we have rarely lost a sheep from the grub, and think that in most cases they will be effectual. Cultivator.

CHURNING BUTTER.—Every good housewife knows that at times, from some peculiar cause, (most generally extra sourness or bitterness of the cream,) much difficulty is experienced in making the cream into butter. A lady, writing in the "Indiana Farmer," recommends the following in such cases. We have says the (Western Farmer) for years used Soda or Saleratus, for the same purpose, and found them usual successful.

"I wish to inform my sister butter-makers, of the means I used, which so successfully removed the difficulty. I churned, perhaps, three hours, to no purpose, and then tried to think of something I had read in the "Indiana Farmer," or some other periodical.

I could not remember precisely, but I recollected the reason stated, was the cream being too sour. I then thought of Soda, (perhaps I presume would do as well,) and dissolved a large tea-spoonful in a pint of warm water, and as I poured it in, churning at the same time, it changed in a moment, and gradually formed into a beautiful solid lump of sweet and rich flavoured butter."

The Potato was found wild in various parts of America, by the first discoverers, and it still is so found. It grows abundantly in a wild state, near Valparaiso, and along the coast for many miles, where its flowers are always a pure white, instead of being colored like the cultivated plant. It has been transplanted to for-sign botanical gardens, where the tubers vary but very little from the common cultivated plant. The attempts, therefore, to make it appear doubtful as to its origin, or as not indigenous to this country, render the fact of its being so the more apparent, and the quibblers the more silly and selfish.

It was brought into use, in Great Britain against the strongest and most ridiculous prejudices and misrepresentations of the aristocracy and professional men. Many writers on plants did not even mention it for more than 100 years after its introduction, and not until its merits and cultivation had forced it upon public attention. It had long been extensively cultivated in Ireland, and was well known in Scotland, before it was much used in England.

I was called, in the records of the voyage to this country, openwork. The Irish gardener of Sir W. R., on finding one potato of the maturity of 'apples,' as the result of planting, earnestly enquired of Sir W. if that were the fine fruit of America. Pretending to be disappointed himself, Sir W. ordered his gardener to root out the seed entirely, in doing which, instead of one, he found a bushel of potatoes.

Religious prejudices were waged against it, having been maintained that potatoes were not mentioned in the Bible! Therefore the same anathema was pronounced against it as was pronounced against "spinning wheels" and "corn farmers." On no subject do men appear so irrational as when arraying their religious prejudices against science and the gifts of nature.

More recently the priests of the Ionian Islands pronounced the potato the forbidden fruit, and the cause of the fall of man; hence its use must be scrupulously and wicked. Nor were the French without their prejudices against its use, they having rejected a gentleman for cultivating it, and alleged that he invented it. Popular favor subsequently set in so strong in its favor that Louis XIV. and his court wore the flower in the button-hole of their coats. During the dearth of the Revolution, the cultivation was effectually established. The peasants of Italy were offered a reward by the government before they could be induced to cultivate it; but during a subsequent famine, they refused to receive a reward for that which had saved their lives.

The potato is now generally cultivated in India, China and the East. But it does not thrive well in tropical climates, below 3 or 4,000 feet from the level of the sea.

The potato came into general use on the continent about the middle of last century. A royal edict brought it into general cultivation in Sweden in 1764. In Switzerland it was in use in 1720, and was first made into bread in 1730; so that in 1760 it constituted the food of two thirds of the people. In Poland, also, it has become a chief article of food, 85,763,700 lbs. being raised there in 1827. It was introduced into India about 40 years ago, and it is there now extensively cultivated. It is said to be the best gift which the natives ever received from their European masters. In Hindostan it is increasingly cultivated, as there, it is said, no religious prejudices exist against its introduction, as was the case with their enlightened European masters. But this plant has forced itself into universal use by its valuable qualities, and is now admitted, even by British writers, as 'necessary to the Englishman's fare' and as 'the plant which seems alone to have been wanted to make the British Isles complete.' A glance at the products of our country shows the engrossing importance of this vegetable, especially since emigration has become so great. [Chapman's Hand Book of Plants, &c.]

Mr. Editor.—I have recently attended a wedding at La Harp, at the house of George W. Robinson, Esq., whose courtesy did honor to the occasion, which is generally intended to be one of joy. In the present instance, it was indeed so. One general feeling of happiness and pleasure seemed to pervade the hearts of all the numerous guests present. After partaking of a rich variety of good things, which did honor to the taste of our kind entertainers, the company separated, to dream over the bride's cake, (which was adroitly slipped under our pillows,) with a mutual consent to meet on the following day, at the residence of the bridegroom, Mr. Louis James, whose invitation had been given, to which we repaired at an early hour, where the same feelings which reigned the day previous seemed to pervade the whole company. The table literally groaned under the fat of the land, and each one seemed to be willing to say, "be gone, dull care." Yet with all our merriment, we remembered that there was a time for all things, and after sincerely thanking our Heavenly Father, through president Marks, for our present happiness and imploring his blessings on the new married pair, we retired to rest.

Long may the happy couple live to the enjoyments of this world, and when the angel of death calls them to a higher state of felicity, may they leave an untarnished name to a numerous posterity.

Children.—A popular writer contends that one-fifth of all the children born die before they attain one year old, and significantly asks if a farmer was to lose one-fifth of his cattle, would he not ascertain the cause and apply the remedy? Children are over-fed, over-clothed, take too little exercise in the air, and these are the causes of mortality among them. We agree with the writer, who recommends mothers to study Combe and Brigham instead of Bulwar and Boz.

Parson Miller has succeeded in frightening an old lady in a neighboring town terribly. "Oh heavens!" cried she the other day, if the world does come to an end what shall I do for snuff!

David Babe, the pirate of the Sarah Lavinia, has been convicted in New York, and will 'twing.

Why are printers' bills like faith? Because they are the substance of things hoped for, and the evidence of things not seen.

Riches.—The greatest pleasure of life is love; the greatest treasure, contentment; the greatest possession, health; the greatest ease, sleep; and the best medicine, a true friend.

A NEW FASHIONED FAN.—Some years ago, in Natchez, Mississippi, Professor Maffit was announced to preach in that city on a certain day. The fame of the gifted orator had preceded him, and every person in the City of Bluffs was anxious to hear him. Some how the news happened to reach the hotel of an old woman, who, perhaps, had not heard a sermon for a quarter of a century, and very seldom went out into the world. She determined to hear the stranger. It being excessively warm weather at the time, and having no fan, she started to purchase one. She got to a store where they happened to know her; and aware of her ignorance, they determined to have some fun. The told her they had just received a new fashioned fan, a very beautiful article, and handed her a common gilt bellows! She tried its power to raise a breeze, and was delighted with it. To church she went; the house being crowded, she took her seat near the pulpit. The text was selected, and the preacher progressed warmly with his subject, and so did the old woman, who now brought her fan to face, and commenced blowing away as if her salvation depended upon keeping cool. This attracted the attention of the audience and the preacher, looked down to see what was the matter. His eyes caught the old woman—he stopped and smiled at the ridiculous figure she cut. The old woman observed him looking at her, and cried out "Go it my magnolia bless God I see all attention!"

The audience faintly, the curtain dropped, and we left; but the image of the old woman with her new fan is yet before us.

The Mechanic.—There is not a more honorable member of society—a more useful citizen than he who diligently attends his labor, and rears from its profits a family of children who never ate a dependent or a borrowed crust. But when a cloud of national circumstances intervenes between him and his purpose, when his arm is arrested at the anvil or the loom, has he not a claim alike upon the protection of the state, and the sympathy of his fellow men? While we admit the necessity, we denounce the cause, of public and private charity. Were the man, whose skill is his capital, whose labor is his income, permitted to exercise the one and expend the other when and how he chose, he would not be in the low condition of a pauper; he would be able to assist instead of requiring help.—[Boston Investigator.]

New Kind of Ink.—Some 'live Yankee' has invented a new kind of ink, called the 'Love-letter ink.' The virtue of this ink consists in its being a sure preventive against all cases of 'breach of promise,' as the ink fades away and leaves the sheet blank again in about four weeks after being written upon.—[Boston Bee.]

There was an extraordinary arrival, at Cincinnati last week; the two masted schooner Dolphin, Captain Doyle, from Buffalo, New York, loaded with white fish, and bound for New Orleans. She entered the Ohio; via Cleveland, through the Ohio canal; and is probably the first schooner that has ever been floated from the waters of Lake Erie to the Ohio. [Cleveland P. Den.]

A Maniac. A dreadful event recently threw the town of Kimmie, Italy, into consternation. A young and pretty woman belonging to the middle class of society, obtained permission to visit her husband, who was confined in a mad house. The patient testified the utmost delight at seeing her, and the keeper, at their request retired and left them together. He was however, in a few minutes alarmed at hearing loud cries in the room; he found the maniac holding in his arms his wife, covered with blood. After the first transports of delight had passed over, a fit of fury had come on, and he had thrust out both her eyes with a metal spoon left by mistake in the room. The unfortunate woman was immediately conveyed to the infirmary of the mad house and attended most carefully. She died the next day in dreadful torture, without uttering a word of complaint against her husband. [New York Tribune.]

Confession.—A peasant being at confession accused himself of having stolen hay. The father confessor asked him how many bundles he had taken from the stack. "That is of no consequence," said he; "you may set it down as a wagon load, for my wife and I are soon going to fetch the remainder!"

He who always speaks the truth is respected.

Duties.—In the morning think what thou hast to do, and at night ask thyself what thou hast done.

NOTICE TO EMIGRANTS AND LATTER-DAY SAINTS GENERALLY.

I feel it my duty to say to the brethren generally, and especially those who are emigrating to this place, that there is in the hands of the Trustee in Trust, a large quantity of lands, both in the city and adjoining Townships in this county, which is for sale—some of which belongs to the church and is designed for the benefit of the poor, and also to liquidate debts owing by the church, for which the Trustee in Trust is responsible. Some also is land which has been consecrated for the building of the Temple, and some for the Nauvoo House.

If the brethren who move in here and want an inheritance will buy their lands from the Trustee in Trust, they will thereby benefit the poor, the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and even then only be doing that which is their duty and which I know, by considerable experience, will be vastly for their benefit and satisfaction in days to come. Let all the brethren therefore, when they move into Nauvoo, consult President Joseph Smith the Trustee &c., and purchase their lands of him, and I am bold to say that God will bless them and will hereafter be glad they did so.

We hold ourselves ready at any time to wait upon the brethren and show them the lands belonging to the church and Temple &c., and can be found any day either at President Joseph Smith's Bar Room or the Temple Recorder's Office, at the Temple.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan? Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr James M. Martien! Inquire for Dr James M. Martien's Invaluable remedy for the cure of Fevers.

For Dr James M. Martien's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.

For Dr James M. Martien's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills.

For Dr James M. Martien's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.

For Dr James M. Martien's Cephalic Snuff, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that, in their curative virtues, may be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having roached ripe years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr James M. Martien is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fondest expectations; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by all future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

November 22d, 1843.

City of Nauvoo:

The subscriber takes great pleasure in calling the attention of the public, to the above invaluable remedies; believing that they are a medicine that will tend to secure the health of this city. That they act most mildly, and yet most efficaciously; in uniformity with the laws of nature; and that they are composed of mild herbs. Knowing from experience that no Pill possesses more virtue in their curative properties. Their worth can only be estimated by a fair trial and by following the accompanying directions. The undersigned can produce a host of the most respectable testimony in their favor, and doubts not but a discerning public, will, in the use of them, secure to themselves, that highest boon of heaven—health.

ROBERT CAMPBELL.

The above medicines may be obtained in various stores in the city, and at his House, opposite the Nauvoo Magazine.

Fever Pills $1.50; Life Pills 25 cents; Anti-Dyspeptic Pills $1.00.

ARRIVAL.

RECEIVED, by the Steamers Oange, and St. Louis Oak, at Lyon's New Brick Store, on Hotchkiss streets, between Main and Carlin streets, a splendid stock of New and Genuine GOODS, direct from the City of New York, and Philadelphia; and now offered low for cash at wholesale, and retail. The stock consists in part as follows: Dry Goods, Groceries, Crockery, Glass, and Hard-wares, Books and Stationery, Drugs and Medicines, Paints and Dye stuffs; Boots, Shoes, Military Goods; and a thousand other articles too numerous to mention. Those wishing to make good investments, with their money will do well to call at Lyon's cheap cash store, on Hotchkiss streets, between Main, and Carlin streets, at the New Brick Variety Store (sign of the Lion.)

NEW GOODS, VERY CHEAP.

PRATT & SNOW, corner of Young and Wells Streets, one block north of the Temple, Nauvoo, have just received from Boston the largest supply of Dry Goods ever opened in this city, consisting principally of good staple articles for fall and winter; such as Broad-cloths, Casimires, Sateenets, Flannels, Shirtings, Sheetings, Calicoes, Boots, Shoes, &c. &c. Cash wanted, and country produce bought and sold.

As we intend selling goods very cheap, and on the principles of honor, justice, and impartiality, no one need ask for credit, nor waste breath in haggling for the price, as we have but one invariable price either for cash or barter.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

THESE celebrated Lozenges are now offered to the citizens of Nauvoo and the West, as the best preparation (for the cure of the various diseases for which they are recommended) ever offered to the public. The proprietor, Dr. Sherman, is a regular graduate of Medicine, a member of the Medical Society of the city and county of New York, and these Lozenges are prepared from medical prescriptions which have been approved by the most celebrated physicians in that city; in addition to which they are prepared in so pleasant a manner that children eat them with avidity and cry for more.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPHOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents,) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

POETRY.

THE TRUTH OF SONG.

BY L. T.

Oh! think not that the Muse's child
No heart-felt anguish knows,
Because his plaint, tho' deep and wild,
Is measured accent flows.

Think not his warmly-gushing tear
From feigned sources springs;
The living fount of grief is near,
And murmurs while he sings.

'Tis not amid the turbid roll
Of passion's whirling tide
That words escape the prostrate soul;
But, when its waves subside.

Deep wells of bitterness remain
Within the sufferer's breast;
And then it pours its anguish'd strain
That will not be repressed.

Oh! never has the trembling lyre
To passion's heart been strung,
Save when the heart that waked its fire
Had felt the woes it sung.

LINES.

"Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you."—1 Pet. ch. 5, v. 7.

Child of sorrow, mourning one,
Thou whose light of life is gone;
Thou who weep'st sad and lonely,
In whose heart dwells sorrow only;
Deepest darkness hovering o'er thee,
Nought but agony before thee;
Thou whose brightest hope is death,
Thou who pin'st to yield thy breath;
Thou from whom cold worldlings turn,
Leaving thee alone to mourn;
There is One for thee who carest;
Even though thy soul despaireth.
He is near while thou art sleeping,
He is nigh while thou art weeping;
He has marked thy every sigh,
Breathed when none beside was nigh;
Great He is in majesty,
Yet He stoops to care for thee.

Rest upon Him all thy cares,
Breathe to Him perpetual prayers,
He will never turn away,
He will hear all thou canst say,
He can view thine inmost heart,
He can know thee as thou art.
Thoughts by mortals all unseen,
Hidden by a calm, cold mien;
Sufferings which thy spirit rend,
He can view and comprehend;
He can feel, how tenderly!
Child of misery, for thee!
Come, then, to the Father, God,
He can stay the chattering rod;
Cast thy cares and fears before Him,
And for help and peace implore Him.
To His love for refuge flee,
Child of tears, He cares for thee!

MOMENTS OF SENSIBILITY.

Who that can look around upon the earth,
Its springing green, its many tinted flowers,
Its dark sequestered nooks, its sunny plains,
And thousand other beauties, and not feel
Within the soul's still depths, "that all is good?"
Yet there are times when soft and gentle thoughts

Weave their sweet spells around the loving heart,
That earth's bright scenes are fairer, brighter far,
And glowing happiness is more intense.

When dim-eyed sickness hath been hovering near,
Till every youthful hope hath been subdued,
And the soul breathes no more its fervent prayers—

Its high aspirations after earthly good,—
But calmly waiteth for the peaceful end,
With solemn thoughts, its only midnight watch,
How glorious 'tis, upon returning health,
To wander in the morning's bracing air,
To the glad eye the earth seems newly made,
And each green thing is full of happy life:
The fluttering leaves seem tinkling bells of joy,
And every dewdrop is a world of love.

Again, when sorrow hath been by the hearth,
And grief's low wail been heard in every sound:
When we have wrapt up in our cloak of care,
And listened to no voice that whisper'd peace:
But Time, in silence, wove his months and years,

And threw a holy memory o'er the past;
And sunny rays stole round the tender heart,
And made the buds of joy burst into flower,
How keenly sensitive was every nerve
To the sweet melody of nature's voice!
The wafting breeze brings many a song of love
From the lone woods, where tiny wild flowers dwell;
From the bright stream, that laugheth on its way;

From the dim hills, where dewy heather springs;
And from the rocky glens, where fresh winds play.
Unnumber'd beauties burst from all around,
And every leaf unfolds a wonder deep;
And as we gaze, through the dim twilight's veil,
On the tinged clouds; the far outspreading sky;
The mildly beaming star, that shineth out
From its mysterious path, we can but gaze
And weep with very gratitude, that heaven Has filled all space with things to glad the heart!

Are there not times when each one feeleth thus
In harmony with all that's pure and good?
Such moments, surely, were in mercy given
To cheer us on the dusty paths of life,
As pledges that, if we but toil and gain
The glorious victory over self and sin,
We shall be raised to that high state, where we May love intensely all that heaven has made.
Chorley. MARIE.

Agricultural.

From the Mississippi Valley Farmer.

EXPLANATION OF TERMS.

We give the following explanation of terms, for the benefit of our junior readers, and those young and experienced farmers, who have not made themselves familiar with the technical terms in use among the agriculturalists.

1. Broadcast husbandry—is that in which the grain or seed is sown by a cast of the hand, so as to be strewn equally over the whole ground.

2. Drill husbandry—is that method by which the grain or seed is sown in rows, by means of machines, contrived for that purpose, and the ground afterwards kept stirred and cleared of weeds by a kind of plough called the horse-shoe, hence sometimes called the horse-shoeing husbandry.

3. Convertible husbandry—is when the ground is cultivated alternately in tillage and grass.

This is much practiced in some parts of the country, with wheat and clover. A field in clover, soon after hay, is turned up and sowed with wheat and clover seed.

After the wheat is taken off, it is once mowed, when it is again ploughed up and sowed as before; thus the ground carries wheat every other year, and the intermediate years clover. The term applies also to a succession of any kind of crops in which grass is comprehended as one.

4. Trench ploughing—is running the trench twice in the same furrow.
In doing this the top soil, with all its foul seeds, is cast to the bottom of the trench, and a new soil is thrown up upon which the sun had never before shed its rays. It is done sometimes at one operation, by a plough constructed for the purpose called a trench plough.

5. Horizontal ploughing—is so conducted, by the use of an instrument called "rafter level," as to lay the sides of hills in horizontal beds, about six feet wide, with deep hollows or water furrows between, for the purpose of retaining the rains.

6. Indigenous plants—are such as are natives of the country in which they grow.

Thus, maize, the potatoe, and tobacco, are called indigenous to America, having first been found here, and from America introduced into Europe.

7. Exotic plants—are such as are natives of foreign countries.

Such as the lemon tree, and many others, when introduced into the New England states, and cultivated in hot houses.

8. Annual plants—are such as are of but one year's duration.

Such are most of our garden plants and all others growing from seed sown in the spring, which arrive at maturity in the summer or autumn following, producing flowers and ripe seed, and which afterwards perish in their top and roots.

9. Biennial plants—are such as, in their roots at least, are of two year's duration.

Many of these plants perish in the top the first year, but live in their root through the winter, and the second year shoot up stalks, flower, and produce seed, afterwards perish both in root and branch. Such are the parsnep, carrot, &c.

10. Perennial plants—are of many years duration.
Such are all plants, whether the leaves and stalks perish annually or not, provided the roots are of many years duration, as the horse-radish, burdock, &c.

11. Herbaceous plants—are those whose herb, that is, whose stem and branches are of but one year's duration, whether the root be annual, biennial, or perennial.

12. Esulent plants—are such as are replete with nutritious matter;
consequently, proper for being eaten
as food.

Such as parsneps, carrots, cabbages, beets, and various others of a similar nature.

13. Umbelliferous plants—are all such as produce their flowers on the ends of numerous little flower stalks or rays, nearly equal in length, spreading from a common point or centre, forming a level, usually convex or globose surface, somewhat like a spread umbrella, as the parsnep, carrot, &c.

14. Leguminous plants—are those of the pulse kind, which, producing their seed in pods, may be gathered by the hand, as peas, beans, &c.

15. Calamiferous plants—are all such as have smooth pointed stems, and whose seeds are enclosed in chafy husks or coverings.

All the grains, and most of the grasses, as well as many other plants, are of this kind.

16. Deciduous plants—are all such plants, whether of the tree or shrub kind, as shed or loose their leaves in the autumn or winter seasons.

17. Tuberous roots—are such as consist of one or more knotted tubes, of a solid fleshy substance, as the potatoe, artichoke, &c.

18. Bulbous roots—are such as have a roundish, swelling bulbous form, composed of numerous scales or coats, as the onion, garlic, &c.

19. Tap roots—are such as in the form of a tap, descend down into the ground, in a perpendicular direction, as the carrot, parsnep, red clover, &c.

20. Fibrous roots—are such as are wholly composed of numerous thready or fibrous parts, such as the roots of all kinds of grain.

21. Radicals or radicles—in botany, are the small fibrous roots, which extend themselves in every direction in the earth for the purpose of collecting nourishment for the support of the plant.

22. Green crops—are such as continue green while ripening their seed, or till taken off the ground; such as beans, peas, cabbage, carrots, turnips, &c.

23. White crops—are such as become bleached, or turn white and dry while ripening their seed; such are all the various kinds of grain.

All plants, while their leaves continue green, and especially such as have large leaves, draw much of their nourishment from the atmosphere.

The green crops therefore exhaust
the soil much less than the white crops, whose leaves becoming dry receive nothing from the atmosphere, but draw all their support from the soil while ripening their seed.

HORSE AND COW.

A horse costs the price of three cows. The annual expense of keeping him is about three times as much, including the shoeing. He is worn out or nearly loses his value in ten years, which is a loss of ten per cent.
per annum upon the cost.—Thus if we give for him seventy-five dollars, what is gone in ten years keeping and shoeing, say forty dollars a year, is in ten years, four hundred dollars, making four hundred and seventy-five dollars in all.

Thus every horse a farmer may keep beyond what may be necessary for farm work, is equal to forty-seven dollars and fifty cents out of pocket each year. Upon Dr. Franklin's calculation, that a penny saved is equal to two earned, this forty seven dollars and fifty cents is equal to $90 for if we lose or expend $47 50 it is gone out of pocket, and we have to earn that amount before we can possess it.
Now if we had saved it, and put it with the same amount earned, it would come to ninety-five dollars as plain as can be made.

Let us now look at the cow. An excellent one can be had for twenty-five dollars. She will last ten years; and will make on an average fifty dollars worth of butter and cheese during the year, which may be set down as clear gain, for the skimmed milk will pay for her keeping. This is for ten years, a gain of five hundred dollars; for at the end of that time she will bring her original cost about balanced.

Now how stands the two accounts, of the horse and the cow?

At the end of ten years:—
Dr. Horse $475 00
Cr. Cow $500 00
—That is we have, or we may have for our cow investment, five hundred bright dollars to buy land with, or fit our daughter in marriage, or put out at interest, whereas before we can get four hundred and seventy-five dollars which the horse has cost us, we must earn it.

Let us reflect, then, and see if we have not too many favorite colts on hand, kept not because we want them for use, but to please Tommy and Bill, and for each horse we keep, we can buy two or three cows that will make the world prosper and enable us to look the tax-collector in the face.
—Massachusetts Paper.

BARN YARDS.

It is recommended by intelligent farmers to make barn yards with a hollow in the middle, that they may receive in the centre and there retain all the liquid manure and rain that run through the manure, as the liquid matter from yards of a different construction runs away, and is often wasted, or applied to lands already sufficiently rich.

This plan, though good in point of economy, as it saves manure, is liable to an important objection; a pond of manure and water in the centre of the yard is very inconvenient, the cattle are running into it, and sometimes it is frozen over, so that cattle, are liable to injure on the ice.

The Scotch method of constructing barn yards obviates this objection.

The yard declines from every part towards one side, that all the liquid may run in that direction; then adjoining the yard is a depression, which is made the receptacle of the liquid from the yard, and here are placed various substances to absorb it. In the yard should be placed peat, mud, muck, turfs, and loam, litter, and other substances, as may be convenient, to absorb liquid manure. Some farmers use sand when they intend to apply the manure to moist heavy soils, and clay when the manure is to be applied to light soils.

For convenience in passing in the yard, it is best to have the manure removed in the fall, and when laid in heaps in the field, it may be saved from waste by covering it with loam. By carrying it to the field late in the fall, and applied to the land and covered in the soil early in the spring, there will be but little fermentation in this cold part of the year, consequently but little waste.—Boston Cultivator.

Foreign News.

FROM TEXAS.—By the New York, we have received Houston papers to the 28th ult., and Galveston to the 2nd inst.

Captain Duncan has erected a steam sugar mill on his plantation on the Caney.
This we believe is the first steam sugar mill that has been erected in Texas. The culture of sugar is extending with astonishing rapidity in that section.

Charles Heninger was on the 11th inst.
sentenced by Judge Morris to be hung on the 8th of December next, for the murder of Mr. Tyson. Hoffmeister was also sentenced to be hung on the first Monday in August next; but as there are many palating circumstances in his favor, it is not improbable that he will be pardoned.

The agricultural productions of the country appear to be abundant. Corn is selling on the Trinity, Brazos, and Colorado rivers at thirty cents a bushel, and it is suggested that a profitable trade might be carried on in that article with the West India Islands. It could be delivered there at fifty cents a bushel, and a fair profit be made at that price. The Houston Telegraph says:

It is well known, however, that corn can generally be purchased in the market at New Orleans at a cheaper rate than in New York, and if the trade with the West Indies would be profitable; it is a little surprising that the merchants of New Orleans have not already taken advantage of it, and driven the New York merchants from the West India markets.
As they can trade with those islands upon equal terms with regard to duties as the northern merchants; they surely would have the advantage in the facility of communication, the cheapness of corn and other produce and the cheapness of freight. Whenever the price of corn in Texas, however, is less than at New Orleans, there is no doubt that a profitable trade in this article can be opened with the West Indies.

The German settlers in Austin and Colorado counties, are represented as in a flourishing condition. They came to Texas in very necessitous circumstances.
They emigrated from five to ten years ago. Most of them brought nothing to the country with them, but their families;
all their means being exhausted by their arrival. But they still retained a fund which, nothing, save disease and bodily infirmary could render unavailable—their industry, skill and energy—their moral feelings, habits and common sense—all the funds necessary to acquire every thing in Texas.

The Kentucky Colony is high up the Trinity, and is in a flourishing condition.
Wheat and every variety of grain grows well. We understand that they are erecting fine manufacturing mills, an advantage that the small streams tributary to the Trinity in that region of Texas admirably facilitate.

Col. Lewis I. Cook, who is under arrest and close confinement at Bastrop, was Secretary of the Navy under Gen.
Lamar's administration. He is a gentleman of fine abilities and great courage.
He was educated at West Point to which institution he obtained admission by personally applying to Gen. Jackson when President of the United States, having walked on foot from some portion of Kentucky all the way to Washington, and stating the fact that he had neither friends nor money, which, as he himself says, was sufficient evidence from his tattered appearance.—[N. Orleans Courier, Dec.
6th.

China Negotiations.—We have it from a very well authenticated source in Washington, that in the private negotiations between the British Government and China, there is a special provision by which China agrees to refuse receiving a foreign minister from any other foreign power other than a Consul.

If this very remarkable clause in the treaty between the two countries should prove true, then Mr. Caleb Cushing now upon his way there, may as well return home, and the French government, who have sent their Minister there, will have to send a fleet after him to compel the Celestials to give him a reception.

THE REPEAL OF THE UNION.

BY THOMAS HOOD.

It was a fine clear moonlight night and Mike Mahoney was strolling the beach of the Bay of Ballycreeagh—and who knows why? perhaps to gather dhoolan un, or to look for a crab, but intensely looking for nothing at all because of the time he was whistling—when looking seaward, he saw at about a stone's cast from the shore, a dark object which appeared like a human head. Or was it a seal, or a keg of whiskey? Alas! no such good luck! The dark object moved like a living thing, and approaching nearer into shallower water, revealed successively the neck and shoulders of a man.

Mike wondered extremely. It was a late hour for a gentleman to be bathing, and there was no boat or vessel within leandering distance from which the unknown might have swam. Meanwhile the stranger approached, the gliding motion of the figure changed into a floundering, as if having got within his depth, he was wading through the deep mud.

Hitherto, the object amid the broad path of silver light had been a dark one; but diverging a little out of the glittering water, it now became a bright one, and Mike could make out the features, at least as plainly as those of the man in the moon.
At last the creature stopped a few fathoms off, and in a sort of 'forin voice,' such as the Irishman had never heard before, called to Mike Mahoney.

Mike crossed himself and answered to his name.

What do you take me for? asked the stranger.

Divil knows, thought Mike, taking a terrible scratch at his red head, but he said nothing.

Look here then, said the stranger and plunging head downwards, as for a dive, he raised and flourished in the air a fish's tail, like a salmon's but a great deal bigger.

After this exhibition had lasted about a minute, the tail went down and the head came up again.

Now you know, of course, what I am?

Why thin, said Mike with a broad grin;
axing your pardon, I take it you're a kind of Half Sir.

True for you, said the Merman, for such he was, in a very melancholy tone.
I am only half a gentleman, and it's what troubles me day and night. But I'll become more convenient to you.

And by dint of great exertion, partly crawling and partly shooting himself forward with his tail shrimp fashion, he contrived to reach the beach, when he rolled himself close to Mike's feet, which instinctively made a step a pace in retreat.

Never fear Mike, said the Merman, it's not in my heart to hurt one of the finest peasantry in the world.

Why thin, you'd not object may be, inquired Mike, not quite reassured, to cry O'Connell forever!

By no means replied the Merman, or success to the rent.
Faix, where did he learn that? muttered
Mike to himself.

voice a long way—if you think of Father Mathew's.

Bedad, that's true, exclaimed Mike—
And in course you'll have heard of the Repeal?

Ah, that's it, said the Merman, with a long drawn sigh, and a forlorn shake of the head. That's just it. It's in your power Mike to do me the biggest favor in the world.

With all the pleasure in life, replied Mike, provided there's neither sin nor shame in it.

Not the least taste of either, returned the Merman. It is only that you will help me to repeal the cursed union that has joined the best part of an Irish gentleman to the worst end of a fish.

Merther alive! shouted Mike, jumping a step backward, what cut off your honor's tail!

That's very same, said the Merman—Hereditary bondsmen, know ye not who would be free themselves must strike the blow. But you see, Mike, it's impossible for my case to strike the blow myself.

Shure, and so it is, said Mike reflectively;
and if I thought you'd not be kilten tiroly—which would be a half a murder any how—

Never fear, Mike. Only cut exactly through the first row of scales, between the fish and the flesh, and I shall feel no pain, nor will you ever spill one drop of blood.

Mike shook his head doubtfully indeed,
and then muttered to himself:

Divil a bit of a Repealer without that!

Not a drop, I tell you, said the Merman, there's my hand on it, and he held out a sort of flesh colored paw, with webs between the fingers.

It's a bargain, said Mike, but after all,
and he grinned knowingly at the Merman, supposing your tail cut off from you, it's small walking ye'll get unless I could lend you the loan of a pair o' legs.

True for you, replied the Merman, but it's not the walking that I care for. It's the sitting, Mike, and he winked again with his round sky blue eye, it's the sitting, and which you see it's mighty inconvenient, so long as I'm linked to this scaly Saxon appendage.

Saxon ivit bellowed Mike, hurrah then for the Repeal and whipping out a huge clasp knife from his pocket, he performed the operation just as the Merman had directed—and, strange to say of an Irish operation, without shedding a single drop of blood.

There, said Mike, having first kicked the so discovered tail into the sea, and then setting up the Half Sir like a nine pin on the broad end, there you are, free and independent and fit to sit where you please.

Millia Bechus, Mike, replied the Merman, and as to setting where I please;
here he nodded three times very significantly, thy only seat that will please me will be in the College Green.

Och! that will be a proud day for Ireland! said Mike attempting to shout, and intending to cut a caper and throw up his hat. But his limbs were powerless, and he only gaped with a prodigious yawn.—
As his mouth closed again his eyes opened, but he could see nothing that he could make head or tail of—the Merman was gone.

Bedad! exclaimed Mike shutting his eyes again, and rubbing the flits lustily with his knuckles, what a dihrane I've had of the Repeal of the Union!

Arrival of the Acadia.—The steamer
Acadia arrived at Boston on Wednesday, the 6th, bringing London and Liverpool dates to the 19th. She had very rough weather, and hence her passage—17 days.

There is less news by the arrival (says the Boston Courier) than we have received by any steamer for several months.
Every thing appears to be quiet, not only in Great Britain but on the continent.

Ireland.—The state trials in Ireland drag their slow length along. Little progress has yet been made, and if the statement which has been given by the Times' correspondent be correct, that the defendants have 30,000 witnesses to examine, the proceedings will become the greatest bore in the world.

What the issue will be, is of course problematical. O'Connell's great fear at present is for the preservation of the public peace. It is said that his health is giving way, and that he has been ordered by his medical men to try a change of air.

The last accounts from Dublin state that the state prosecutions will in all probability, be abandoned. Mr. O'Connell's plea of abatement—grounded upon informality in the proceedings before

THE DAGUERRETYPE is daily developing new beauties, and is applied to various new and unexpected objects; immense improvements are also made in taking likenesses with this machine, which is superceding all other modes.

The Boston Transcript says:—
Mr. Osborn, of South Boston, a practical chemist, called upon us on Saturday last, and, modestly requesting to make us a present, placed in our hands a neat morocco miniature case, upon opening which, there laid spread out before us the "Transcript," for Dec. 19th—the outside towards us, and the whole array of advertisements looking "as neat and as cunning as possible." The Daguerreotype had done the deed, and our bantling diurnal was reduced from the reputed "seven by nine," to the actual inch and half! The heading, capital letters, and pictorial figures were clear to the naked eye, and by the aid of a twelve power microscope, the canny letter press may be read with ease.

Altogether, it is the most beautiful specimen of the art that we have ever seen—wholly free from the slightest blur even upon the smallest letter.

THE QUEEN.—The good people of Liverpool complain, that the Queen, in the midst of her foreign and local travel, has never looked into that thriving City of her dominions.

There has not been an English King or Queen to their recollection in Lancashire, since Charles the Second marched through that county at the head of an army, which was beat at Worcester by Oliver Cromwell.

William the Third called at Liverpool previous to his embarking on his Irish campaign.

THE LOST TRUNK.—A stranger entered a store in Utica, last week, and presented a Union Bank Bill, supposed to have been one of the Bills in Pomeroy & Co.'s lost trunk. The shop-keeper's suspicions were not aroused until the fellow left the store, and then he could not be found.

THE FLOOD.—The N. O. Bee of the 20th ult. says:—"Captain Benoit, of the steamboat Nathan Hale, informs us that the Bayou De Glauze had completely overflowed its banks, and was still on the rise when he left."

Doctor Biggs, plantation was partly overflowed, and some of the cotton of which his cargo is composed was afloat when taken on board. This unusual freshet for this season in the region immediately above us, has effected the river at this point, where it has suddenly risen four to five feet."

DISCOVERY OF THE EFFICACY OF YEAST, IN THE CURE OF PUTRID FEVER.—During my residence at Brampton, a populous parish near Chesterfield, a putrid fever broke out amongst us.

Finding by far the greater number of my parishioners too poor to afford themselves medical attendance, I undertook, by the help of such books on the subject of medicine as were in my possession, to prescribe for them. I attended a boy, about fourteen years of age, who was attacked by the fever. He had not been ill many days before the symptoms were unequivocally putrid. I then administered bark, wine, and such other medicines as my books directed. My exertions, however, were of no avail: his disorder grew every day more and more untractable and malignant, so that I was in hourly expectation of his dissolution. Being under the necessity of taking a journey, before I set off I went to see him, as I thought, for the last time; and I prepared his parents for the event of his death, which I considered as inevitable, and reconciled them in the best manner I could to a loss which I knew they would feel severely. While I was in conversation on this distressing subject with his mother, I observed in a corner of the room a small tub of wort working.

The sight brought to my recollection an experiment, I had somewhere met with of a piece of putrid meat being made sweet by being suspended over a tub of wort in the act of fermentation.

The idea flashed into my mind that the yeast might correct the putrid nature of the disease, and I instantly gave him two large spoonfuls. I then told the mother, if she found her son better, to repeat this dose every two hours. I then set out on my journey.

Upon my return, after a few days, I was informed that he was recovered. I could not repress my curiosity, and, though greatly fatigued with my journey, and night was come on, I went directly to his residence, which was three miles off in a wild part of the moors, and to my great surprise, the boy himself opened the door, looking well, and he told me he had felt better from the time he took the yeast.—Memoirs of the Life, Writings, and Mechanical Inventions of E. Cartwright.

THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.—One of the most characteristic illustrations of this fact that has lately come to our knowledge, occurred in South Carolina, some time since. A well-known betting man—the brother of a prominent turfman of the Old Dominion—was lying so dangerously ill that his friends expected his dissolution momentarily.

The physician, bending over his dying patient, apprised him that he could live but a few hours, whereupon the latter faintly asked him the amount of his bill? The astonished doctor replied—"Fifty dollars." "Then" replied the dying man, "I'll bet you double or quits, I'll live till morning!"

He lived just long enough to win his doctor's bill, and then died!—New York Spirit of the Times.

CURIOUS ANECDOTE.—An eloquent and popular preacher in Naples, in preaching a discourse upon mental hallucination, related a curious anecdote of an insane patient, who had obstinately refused to eat. "Whilst residing at Rome," said the preacher, "I paid a visit to the Lunatic Asylum there, among the more remarkable patients, was one pointed to me, who had been saved, with much difficulty, from inflicting death upon himself by voluntary starvation. I was under an impression that he was defunct, declaring that dead people never ate."

It was soon obvious to all that the issue must be fatal, when the humane doctor bethought himself of the following stratagem. Half a dozen of the attendants, dressed in white shrouds, and their hands and faces covered with chalk, were marched in single file, with dead silence, into a room, adjoining that of the patient's, where he observed them through a door purposely left open, sit down to a hearty meal.

"Hullo!" said he that was deceased, to an attendant, "what be they?" "Dead men," was the reply. "What?" rejoined the corpse. "Do dead people eat?" "To be sure they do, as you see," answered the attendant. "If that's the case," exclaimed the defunct, "I'll join them, for I'm famished," and thus instantly was broken the spell.

A SLEEP WALKER.—An extraordinary instance of somnambulism occurred just after the bewitching hour of midnight, on Tuesday, in Bagnigge-wells-road. The passers by were alike astonished and confounded on seeing a white figure approaching them with a lighted candle in one hand and a book in the other. On closer inspection, it was found to be a man, with his shirt on only, wading with his bare feet, through the muddy streets, and his eyes open, and bearing a glassy stare; he turned up, passed Mr. Silcock's wine and spirit establishment, into Frederick-street, and with unerring step, passed through the posts that go across the right side of that street, when he was shortly afterwards stopped by a policeman, who awoke him.

The poor fellow, shivering and shaking with cold, begged not to be taken to the station-house, and the constable humanely conducted him home to his affrighted family, at the corner of Swinton-street and Acton-place. The book he carried under his arm, was his account book, containing the supplies to his customers, and he also had his snuff-box in his hand, and it would appear that he was dreaming, that he was going, as usual, his daily rounds.—Ex. Paper.

THE WEDDING RING.—The wedding ring is put upon the fourth finger of the woman's left hand, because in the original formulary of marriage, it was placed first upon the top of the thumb with the words, "In the name of the Father; then on the next finger, with the words, 'and of the Son;' then on the middle finger, with, 'and of the Holy Ghost;' and finally on the fourth, with the 'Amen.'"

NUMBER OF PERSONS WHO ATTENDED REPEAL MEETINGS.—The number of persons set forth in the indictment against Mr. O'Connell and others as attending the Reform meetings is as follows:—

Mr. Trim	30,000
Mr. Mullingar	100,000
Mr. Long	500,000
Mr. Longford	200,000
Mr. Drogheda	300,000
Mr. Kilkenny	400,000
Mr. Malvern	200,000
Mr. Donnybrook	200,000
Mr. Rathfriland	300,000
Mr. Tarahill	800,000
Mr. Loughrea	100,000
Mr. Clifton	50,000
Mr. Lismore	100,000
Mr. Mullaghmast	100,000
Total	3,880,000

ALMOST A MURDER.
"For murder, though it have no tongue, will speak with most miraculous organ."
A man may outrage society by the crime of suicide, and, perhaps, have some claim upon our pity; for a man must be miserable before he can voluntarily retire from his place among the breathing, and misery is a thing that should awaken some part of our softer nature in its behalf. But a man who will commit self-murder and leave his friend to be hung for it, perpetrates at once both suicide and murder, and his memory must be execrated. Instances are common enough of these two frightful crimes, in all their shades and varieties, have arisen from the fiendish influence of alcohol, and the present anecdote will be found to have taken origin in the same cause.

It is a circumstance partaking in a singular manner, of the ludicrous and the horrid; but however strange the story may seem, it is nothing more than a simple relation of a real occurrence. In proof of this, we shall use the names of the parties, as no harm can be done in mentioning them at this date.

In the little town of Dover, which is situated on the Cumberland river, in Middle Tennessee, there lived some years ago an eccentric and intemperate old bachelor, by the name of Kingston. On one occasion, when prostrated on his bed by excess, and suffering acutely from those stings and horrors peculiar to his situation, he sent for one of his old boon companions to come and visit him. Shyrack, for that was the other's name, came duly to Kingston's room.

"What's the matter, Kingston?"

"Shyrack, shut the door."

"Yes, my dear fellow."

"Lock it."

"Eh?"

"Lock the door."

"Certainly, my dear fellow."

"Shyrack, I'm going to kill myself."

"My dear fellow, let me entreat you not to do it."

"No, no, oblige me and don't."

"Must do it."

"Don't; it'll be the death of you."

Shyrack was quite cool and jocular, little dreaming that so terrible an event was actually going to take place.

Kingston had, as the last eccentric act of his life, taken a chisel and mallet to bed with him; and now, with desperate resolve, he seized the extraordinary tools of death, and in an instant, drove the blade of the chisel into his breast!

The hair rose upon Shyrack's head, and fright spread like a sheet of snow, over his face.

Kingston! Kingston! my dear fellow—you d—n rascal, Kingston! do you want to have me hung? Hold on! don't you die till I call somebody!"

Shyrack ran to the door, and called like a madman to some people across the street.

"Hullo! here! say, you Mister! all you stupid people, make haste over here, or there'll be a murder!"

The people crowded into Kingston's house.

Don't die, Kingston! Don't chisel me that way! Don't die till you tell them what you did."

"I did it myself," said Kingston.

There that'll do; now, my dear fellow, you may die," replied Shyrack, taking a long breath, and wiping the perspiration from his forehead.

And Kingston did die, in this extraordinary manner, leaving his fate to be recorded as a suicide that was almost a murder!—N. O. Pic.

THE ECCENTRIC MORTAL. Lord Timothy Dexter, said many curious things, but his idea of ingratitude is the richest thing of the kind we ever met with.

"D—n that fellow," said his lordship one day, while speaking of a neighbor whom he had befriended, without being thanked, "he is like a hog under a tree, eating acorns, but never thinks of looking up to see where they come from."

NEGRO ELOQUENCE.—A Boston "dandy black" stepped into a provision store in that city, to buy some potatoes; before purchasing, he gave the following truly eloquent description of his nature.

"De inter is inevitably bad, or inwardly good. Dero is no medecine in de combination of de tater. De exterior may indeed, appear remarkably exemplary and hutesome, while de interior is totally negative; but, sir, if you wends de article 'pon your own recommendations, knowing you to be a man of probability in all your translations, why, sir, without further circumlocution, I takes a bushel!"

A SOLEMN TRUTH.—No man ever prospered who defrauded a printer or abused his wife.

A splendid meteor passed over Woodstock, Ct. on the 30th ult.

NOTICE TO EMIGRANTS AND LATTER-DAY SAINTS GENERALLY. I feel it my duty to say to the brethren generally, and especially those who are emigrating to this place, that there is in the hands of the Trustee in Trust, a large quantity of lands, both in the city and adjoining Townships in this county, which is for sale—some of which belongs to the church and is designed for the benefit of the poor, and also to liquidate debts owing by the church, for which the Trustee in Trust is responsible. Some also is land which has been consecrated for the building of the Temple, and some for the Nauvoo House.

If the brethren who move in here and want an inheritance will buy their lands from the Trustee in Trust, they will thereby benefit the poor, the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and even then only be doing that which is their duty and which I know, by considerable experience, will be vastly for their benefit and satisfaction in days to come. Let all the brethren therefore, when they move into Nauvoo, consult President Joseph Smith the Trustee &c., and purchase their lands of him, and I am bold to say that God will bless them and will hereafter be glad they did so.

We hold ourselves ready at any time to wait upon the brethren and show them the lands belonging to the church and Temple &c., and can be found any day either at President Joseph Smith's Bar Room or the Temple Recorder's Office, at the Temple.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan? Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr James M. Martien! Inquire for Dr James M. Martien's Invaluable remedy for the cure of Fevers.

For Dr James M. Martien's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.

For Dr James M. Martien's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills.

For Dr James M. Martien's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.

For Dr James M. Martien's Cephalic Snuff, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that, in their curative virtues may be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having reached riper years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr James M. Martien is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fondest expectations; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

November 22d, 1843.

City of Nauvoo:

The subscriber takes great pleasure in calling the attention of the public, to the above invaluable remedies; believing that they are a medicine that will tend to secure the health of this city. That they act most mildly, and yet most efficaciously; in uniformity with the laws of nature; and that they are composed of mild herbs. Knowing from experience that no Pill possesses more virtue in their curative properties. Their worth can only be estimated by a fair trial and by following the accompanying directions. The undersigned can produce a host of the most respectable testimony in their favor, and doubts not but a discerning public, will, in the use of them, secure to themselves, that highest boon of heaven—health.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPHOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after disipation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents,) brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by J. SNIDER, (22-y.)

FOREWORD.

FAREWELL TO NAUVOO.

Fair city of the saints! my heart to thee
Will often turn with sadness and regret,
When far away my dwelling place shall be,
For there are scenes I never can forget.
Connected with the memory of Nauvoo;
Scenes which my heart will often dwell upon.
And memory to her station ever true
Will bring them back to me when I am gone.
These scenes with mournful pleasure reflected In memory's glass will often be reflected.

Though the obliterating hand of time
Has from the mind a thousand things effaced,
Yet principles eternal and sublime,
When once imprinted cannot be erased.
These principles have now become to me
Part of myself—a portion of my mind,
And I must lose my own identity
Before such principles can be resigned.
When once received, in spite of all resistance,
They form the essence of the soul's existence.

Fair city of the saints! I love thee well;
To me thy memory will be ever dear.
I would to God I could forever dwell
Amidst thy pleasant scenes where I could hear
The words of inspiration every day,
And hourly treasure up within my heart
Wisdom and knowledge that will not decay;
Light and intelligence that will impart
New glory to the beauties of creation,
Filling the mind with wondering admiration.

O! I have listened with suspended breath
To hear the words of wisdom as they fell
From lips inspired, and felt that life nor death,
Nor all the powers combined of earth and hell
Could never force my heart to turn aside
From principles so holy and sublime.
Truth be my only creed, and God my guide,
And I shall safely pass the storms of time,
And gain at last a high and holy station,
Among the ransomed in the new creation.

Farewell, Nauvoo! I must again return
Back to my gentle bondage as before,
But oftentimes my heart will sadly yearn
To hold communion with the saints once more.
How I shall long the prophet's voice to hear—
The words of wisdom flowing from his tongue
Truths most sublime are made so plain and clear
That oftentimes I am almost dumb
Upon his words, which forced the exclamation—
These surely are the words of inspiration!

DEBATE IN CONGRESS.

REMARKS OF MR. HARDIN,

OF ILLINOIS,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, JAN-UARY 17.

On the resolution offered by Mr. Thompson, of Kentucky, to instruct the Committee of Ways and Means to report an appropriation sufficient to keep the snag boats on the Mississippi and its tributaries in operation during the present year.

Mr. Speaker: Although I am aware that the House must be fatigued with the length of the debate on this subject, yet, before the question is taken on the resolution, I desire to present to the honorable members on this floor some facts which have not been fully presented for their consideration. Before doing so, however, I may be permitted to advert to some remarks which have been made by several gentlemen, representing the old States, in reference to what they term the sectional feeling which has been manifested by the Western members in this debate. It is true that all the members from the West are impressed with the belief that the expenditures of the public money have been partial and unequal, and that the wants and interests of the West, especially in regard to the question now before the House, have been overlooked and disregarded. It is also true that there is a very general disposition amongst the Western members to press the consideration of this subject, arising from the anxiety which is so universally felt in the West, to see some efficient action in Congress favorable to their wishes. But whilst these admissions are made, showing the causes of that extreme solicitude in urging a prompt consideration of the claims of the Western rivers, which some gentlemen have so much deprecated, I will not admit that we are influenced by sectional considerations in pressing this resolution. Experience and travel have fully convinced me that there is less sectional feeling in the West than in any other portion of the Union, and for myself, sir, I must be permitted to say that in my action on questions connected with the improvement of the country, I will always be found ready to award to the North, East, or South, that justice in ministering to their wants, and to vote those appropriations required by their situation and condition, which I now ask for the West. In former days, when any of these sections asked for appropriations for the security and defence of their frontier, or of their commerce, or there has been a demand for soldiers to assist them in resisting the attacks of a foreign enemy, the West always came to their aid, with their votes, their money, and their men. And we will not at this late day permit ourselves to be branded with acting upon selfish or sectional feeling, in urging the claims of the West for the objects proposed in the resolution.

The West does not ask of gentlemen that they should vote for appropriations whose benefits are purely confined to the western citizens. She places her claims upon higher ground, and demands, as a matter of right and justice, that those streams which constitute the common highways of the nation, and on whose bosoms are borne freights belonging to, and destined for, every section of this Union, should have the aid of the General Government in removing the obstructions to their navigation, which the immense and increasing business done upon them, and their importance to the trade and wealth of the whole country, impiously justify and require. Our magnificent streams, though they are situated in the West, do not belong to the people of the west. They are the common property of the people of the nation, and of incalculable value to the commerce of the nation—are subject to the jurisdiction and are regulated in the management of their trade by the laws of Congress, and therefore claim from this body those appropriations which are indispensable for their safe navigation.

The enquiry is frequently made by those who are opposed to make any appropriation for the improvement of these rivers? I answer, that the power and duty of Congress to legislate on this subject arise from three distinct sources:

First. The General Government owns in the new States and the organized territories 300,000,000 acres of land, and west of Missouri and Arkansas 800,000,000 of acres more. As it is the interest of the Government to dispose of these lands as speedily as possible, and as it is certainly the right of the Government, as the great landholder of the western lands, to improve the value of those lands, it is therefore both within the power and duty of Congress to improve the navigation of these rivers, that the Government lands may be enhanced in value, that emigrants may find them of easier access, and thereby a more ready market be afforded for them.

Second. By the ordinance of 1787, which was a compact made between Virginia, the States of the Union, and the inhabitants of the Northwestern Territory, and which has been judicially recognized as obligatory upon the people and present Government, it is provided—

"That the navigable waters leading into the Mississippi and St. Lawrence, and the carrying places between the same, shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said territory as to the citizens of the United States, and those of any other States that may be admitted into the Confederacy without any tax, impost, or duty therefor."

By the term 'carrying-places' between said rivers, it was well understood at the time, as it is now by those acquainted with the localities, were meant those places where the hunters, traders and armies of the nation carried their furs, peltries, stores, and military equipments across the land between the headwaters of those streams, some of which ran into the St. Lawrence and the others into the Mississippi; the principal carrying places then intended to be designated; being undoubtedly those between the head waters of the Wabash and Miami of the Ohio and the Maumee of the Lakes, that between the Illinois river and the waters of Lake Michigan, and that between the Wisconsin river and the Fox river, of Lake Michigan. The control of these rivers and carrying places being thus vested in the General Government, and the Government having always reserved from sale the bed of the navigable streams in the country referred to in the ordinance, and both rivers and carrying places being declared free to all the people of the nation, the States cannot exercise exclusive jurisdiction over them, and Congress has at all times the power of making such provisions for the regulation of the commerce over these 'public highways' as it may deem necessary for the benefit of the people of the States.

The third ground upon which we base the authority of Congress to act in this matter, and which never has been and cannot be met by any fair argument, is to be found in those clauses of the Constitution of the United States which provide that—

"Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." Also, "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into effect the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or office thereof."

It will be observed that precisely the same words are used to give Congress the power to regulate commerce between the States as is given it to regulate foreign commerce. The power to regulate commerce necessarily carries with it the power to do all those acts which are essential to render commerce useful, safe and profitable. To effect this it may become necessary to guard against the depredations of pirates, or to remove local obstructions, which equally may prevent or injure commercial intercourse. An illustration may present this subject in a light more strongly than an argument.—Every Congress has made appropriations to erect light houses, to build breakwaters, and deepen the mouths of harbors on the seaboard. Now, there is no express delegation of power to Congress in the Constitution to do any of these acts, and whence then comes the power thus to expend the public money, and to exercise jurisdiction over these light houses, &c. when they are constructed? The only answer which can be given is, that the power is inferrible from the general grants of power quoted above, and that the construction of these works are means necessary and proper to be used to carry into effect the general grant to 'regulate commerce.' The same rule of argument will apply to the construction of roads for military purposes, or to railroads and canals, which may become necessary for facilitating the commercial intercourse of the nation. If any of these are means necessary and proper to be used for the protection of the military defenses of the country in time of war, or to protect and defend the commerce of the nation, either foreign or inland, it is within the power of Congress to appropriate money for their construction, in order to enable it to provide for the common defence of the country, and to regulate commerce between the States as well as with foreign nations. It is not a question of power. This is too clear to be disputed. The only question is as to the policy and expediency of adopting the measure which may be proposed in order to carry out the clearly delegated powers of this body.

An objection occurs to me here, which is most frequently urged by gentlemen residing in the Old Dominion, or by those from the Palmetto State, which is, that Congress has no proper jurisdiction beyond tide water, and consequently no right to appropriate money to be expended off salt water for internal improvement purposes. These gentlemen call themselves 'strict constructionists,' and boast that they belong to the 'strict-jacket school.' It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, as though these gentlemen would treat the Constitution as maniacs are treated in hospitals. They would confine it to sea-coast fortifications, which cost tens of millions of dollars. They would illuminate it with the light-houses, which cost nearly a half a million annually to keep their oil from burning out. They would guard it with a navy whose annual charge is above eight millions of dollars. And then, sir, they would complete the prescription by enclosing the patient in a strait-jacket composed of sea-weed, pour salt water in profusion upon its head to keep the Western fever down, and feed it with a light diet of salt-water crabs and herrings.

Why, sir, will any of these gentlemen point out the provision in the Constitution of the United States (or of common sense) which authorizes Congress to expend millions upon the seaboard for the protection of commerce, but which also prohibits it from spending a copper in the interior for a similar purpose? That provision in the Constitution which empowers Congress to erect a light-house, construct a breakwater, or deepen a harbor on the seaboard, extends equally to the interior, and authorizes Congress to remove the sandbars, to deepen the channels, and to remove the snags from our rivers. These last obstruct the commerce between the States as much as the shallow harbors and reefs on the sea board, the storms of the ocean, or the pirates of the seas, obstruct and endanger our commerce with foreign nations. And the same principles of constitutional law, as well as the same sense of justice, render it both necessary and proper for Congress to afford a similar assistance to commerce in the one case as in the other.

In order to show that the opinions of our most conspicuous public men and the practice of our Government have corresponded with the constitutional view I have presented, I will turn the attention of the House to a few facts.

In No. 14 of the Federalist, which was written by Mr. Madison, he uses the following language:

"Let it be remembered in the third place that the intercourse throughout the Union will be daily facilitated by new improvements. Roads will be every where shortened and kept in better order; accommodations for travellers will be multiplied and ameliorated; and interior navigation on our eastern side will be opened throughout, or nearly throughout, the whole extent of the Thirteen States. The communications between the Western and Atlantic districts, and the different parts of each, will be rendered more and more easy by those numerous canals with which the beneficence of Nature has intersected our country, and which art finds it so little difficult to connect and complete."

In 1806 Congress, with the approval of Mr. Jefferson, made the first appropriation for the construction of the Cumberland road. About the same period Mr. Jefferson caused a survey to be made of a road between the city of Washington and New Orleans.

In 1808 Albert Gallatin made his celebrated report in favor of the policy of establishing a system of internal improvements by the General Government.

In 1810, on the motion of John C. Calhoun, then a prominent member of the Republican party, and the warm advocate of internal improvements, a committee was appointed to enquire into the expediency of setting apart the boats and net annual profits of the National Bank as a permanent fund for internal improvements.

Mr. Monroe, in one of his messages to Congress, says: "That in his opinion Congress have an unlimited power to raise money, and that in its appropriations they have a discretionary power, restricted only by the duty to appropriate it to purposes of common defence, and of general, not local—not nation, but State benefit." And this was the avowed principle upon which he acted through his administration, in 1824, the following law was passed:

"An act to procure the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates, upon the subject of roads and canals."

"Be it enacted, &c. That the President is hereby authorized to cause the necessary surveys, plans, and estimates to be made of the route of such roads and canals as he may deem of national importance in a commercial or military point of view, or necessary for the transportation of the public mail, &c."

And appropriated thirty thousand dollars for the purpose of making the surveys.

Under the powers conferred upon the President by this law a great many surveys were made, and amongst them was one for a canal between the Illinois river and Lake Michigan. During the whole of the administrations of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Adams regular and often large appropriations were made for roads and canals and rivers, in every part of the nation. During the whole of Gen. Jackson's administration these appropriations were also made, although they were checked and diminished for the most part for the Western country by the veto on the appropriations to the Maysville road and the Wabash river. Notwithstanding these vetoes, appropriations were regularly made for objects of internal improvement during that administration, some of which, in my view, are of far less national importance than those vetoed. I will read a few, taken at random from the many I find in the laws passed after the veto on the Maysville road:

- In 1830. For improving the navigation of Conneaug creek, in Ohio $6,135
- For improving the navigation of Genesee river in New York 13,335
- For removing obstructions in the navigation of the Kennebec river, in Maine 5,000
- To Cape Fear river, in North Carolina 25,688
- In 1831. For Ashabula creek harbor 7,016
- For Black river harbor 9,275
- For Oswego harbor 21,412
- For D. or Island sea-wall, Massachusetts 12,390
- For navigation of Conneaug creek 6,370
- For navigation of Genesee river, New York 16,670

Besides these, there were appropriations made chiefly during the administration of General Jackson, for the Chesapeake and Ohio canal, the Delaware and Raritan canal, the Disal Swamp canal, the Louisville and Portland canal, amounting to some millions of dollars. And numberless other instances of similar appropriations might be cited during the administration of General Jackson and those who preceded him. Amongst other items I find that two and a half millions of dollars have been appropriated for the construction of the Cumberland road, in twenty-six different laws, which have been approved by every President from Jefferson to Tyler. During the latter part of the administration of Mr. Van Buren, these appropriations were generally, if not entirely suspended. The necessary appropriations for the western rivers were withheld, and the Cumberland road having progressed so far from salt water, was considered to have become lost in the western wilds, and had certainly out-travelled the limits of constitutional appropriations. Such was the manner in which the west was treated, whilst larger sums were squandered in the expenditures of the Government than had ever been before, since the organization of the Government. Under the present administration, something more has been begun, but the appropriations have been altogether too limited to answer the desired purposes.

In proof of the statements above, I present the accompanying table, taken from Document No. 31, of the first session of the 27th Congress, which was prepared by the Secretary of the Treasury. The first column exhibits the amount of appropriations for internal improvements from 1820 to 1840. The second exhibits the aggregate public expenditures during those years, exclusive of payment for the public debt and trust funds. Under the head of internal improvement are estimated appropriations for harbours, rivers, lakes, breakwaters, sea-walls, roads, &c.

Appropriations.	Expenditures.
1820 - $680,518	$12,651,457
1830 - 613,432	13,229,637
1831 - 1,335,464	13,665,746
1832 - 1,220,065	16,514,124
1833 - 1,090,833	22,050,312
1834 - 1,777,757	18,120,567
1835 - 1,438,061	17,066,513
1836 - 1,929,325	29,645,244
1837 - 2,103,034	31,610,003
1838 - 2,099,618	32,544,003
1839 - 166,442	26,443,716
1840 - 19,000	22,389,356

Some members seem to be unapprised of the importance and amount of trade which is transacted upon the Western waters, and of the population which is dependent upon them, for the means of travel and transportation, as well as of the rapid increase of both population and commerce in the West. I will take this occasion to present some of the leading facts bearing upon this subject, which have been collated partly from the census returns, and in part from the reports and statements of various persons who have made this a particular subject of investigation, and in whose statements I confidently rely:

In 1840 the population of the Western States was 6,376,972

In 1840 the population of the Atlantic States was 10,686,331

The area of the Western states in square miles is 839,930

The area of the Atlantic States in square miles is 448,650

The increase of the Atlantic States from 1830 to 1840 was at the rate of 16 per cent.

The increase of the Western States during the same period was at the rate of 73 per cent.

The increase of the Atlantic States from 1810 to 1840 was at 100 to 173.4.

The increase of the Western States from 1810 to 1840 was at 100 to 591.4.

It will thus be found that whilst the Atlantic States have not doubled in thirty years, the Western States have, in the same time, augmented nearly six fold.

In some of the new States the increase far exceeded the general average; for instance, the decennial increase of Mississippi was 173 per cent; of Missouri 173 per cent, of Illinois 202 per cent, and of Michigan 555 per cent.

In 1850 the population of the Atlantic and Western States will be very nearly equal, if they progress in population in the same ratio that they have done for the last ten or twenty years; and at every succeeding census the relative strength of the West will increase on the Atlantic states. The above facts are taken from a work recently published by Professor Tucker, of the University of Virginia.

The extent of steamboat navigation on the Western waters has been variously computed at from 12,000 to 15,000 miles; the latter estimate being, in my opinion, the most correct, as there are various rivers in the west, the extent of whose navigation is not yet known, as there have been no sufficient inducements offered to steamboats to navigate them.

There are on the Western rivers 550 steamboats, with an average tonnage of 200 tons, equal to 110,000 tons.

Of these boats about 100 were built during the last year, and the average cost of each is ascertained to be about $20,000, making the first cost of the steamboats in the West $11,000,000—About 4,000 flat boats annually descend the Western rivers, laden with every description of western produce, which are destroyed when they reach the South; and which cost $600,000.

If we add together the amounts paid for insurance, for boat hands, fuel, wear and tear of boats, interest at 6 per cent. on the amount invested, and for flat boats, it will show that there is an annual expenditure on the Western waters, for the cost of transportation of passengers and freight, of $15,000,000.

These boats are engaged in transporting an amount of freight, which may surprise those who have not examined the facts of the case.

The downward trade to New Orleans is estimated at $60,000,000

The upward cargoes at the same time 60,000,000

The trade arising from the manufactures of the cities on the Western waters, and of the produce which does not descend to New Orleans, and of the effects of Emigrants is estimated at 70,000,000

The amount of goods brought by way of Pittsburgh and the Lakes down the Western rivers, from the East, may be estimated at 60,000,000

Making a total of values transported annually amounting to $250,000,000

This amount not only is enormous, but facts show that the increase of this trade is 10 per cent. per annum.

It will appear by a report submitted to the present Congress, page 145 of Doc. No. 1, that the trade of the Lakes in 1840 amounted to $85,926,000. This trade has increased beyond all calculation, and was estimated in 1843 $100,000,000.

The extent of lake coast is about 5,200

m. l.s. of which 2000, belong to Great Britain.

Without advertent to the trade on the canals and railroads of the Atlantic States, which must amount to $200,000,000, it will be seen that the internal commerce of the United States on the Northern Lakes and Western Rivers amounts annually to $350,000,000.

It is said that comparisons are odious; but at the risk of exciting the envy of some of our Atlantic friends, I will briefly compare this trade with the foreign commerce of the nation.

From the report submitted to this Congress by the Secretary of the Treasury it appears that the

Imports for 1842 amounted to $100,182,087

Exports for 1842 104,691,634

Making a total of $204,873,721

Look, now, at the expenditures for the protection of this foreign commerce, and we will take the expenditures of the year 1842, as reported to us in Doc. No. 7 of the present session, which are about an average with the expenditures of a series of years for the same purpose.

Foreign intercourse, which embraces the expenses of maintaining gunboats at foreign ports $357,884

Support and maintenance of light-houses &c. 389,338

Building custom-houses 109,580

Survey of the coast of the United States 67,263

Add to this the expenses of the navy, which is entirely employed in protecting our foreign trade $2,224,999

And we have a total expenditure for the protection of foreign commerce of $2,982,065

I permit me to call the attention of honorable members to the amount which has been expended during the same time for the protection of our internal commerce.

Harbors, rivers, roads &c. $108,482

Surveys 77,708

Total $186,190

It is presumed that there is a balance unexpended, as I perceive that the last Congress appropriated for this purpose $205,000

It will be seen that the expenditures for the aid of our internal commerce on the lakes and rivers did not amount to one-twentieth of one per cent, whilst the Government expends about five per cent, on the gross amount of our foreign commerce for its protection. And in fact it expended the last year fifty times as much for the protection of foreign commerce, as it did for the internal commerce of the country.

Now, sir, I appeal to gentlemen, when they hear of disasters occurring every week on the Western waters for want of the aid of the General Government in making appropriations for their safety, if it is right, is it proper that this inequality should exist? And would we not be recreant to every principle of duty to our constituents, and inconsiderate to every noble feeling which should excite us to action, when we have so recently heard of the disasters which have befallen the property and lives of our friends, if we did not earnestly but firmly press the consideration and favourable action of Congress in behalf of the Western waters.

The losses which are sustained by accidents upon the Western waters far exceed the losses which occur in any other branch of our commerce.

Those who have examined the subject state that one steamboat is lost by these accidents on an average, every week in the year. Estimating the loss of boat and cargo at but $20,000, which is a very reasonable calculation, the annual loss is $1,040,000.

Three fourths of these accidents occur from snags and other similar obstacles, which might be removed if sufficient funds were expended for that purpose. Nor are these accidents confined to losses of property; for this House has but too recently seen the accounts of the loss of between forty and fifty individuals by the sinking of the Shepherdess. I regret that I have not the data to state with absolute certainty the number of lives which are lost upon these rivers; but I feel confident that I am within the mark in stating the number of lives annually sacrificed by the neglect of the General Government to remove these obstructions at two hundred. We are shocked at the inhumanity of the Pagans, when we are informed by travellers that they throw their offspring into the Ganges to appease the wrath of gain the favor of an imaginary deity. Yet this Government, with all its pretensions to civilization and refinement, and with all its boasted regard for the welfare of every one of its citizens, is guilty of as gross injustice and of equal barbarity in exposing the lives of so many of its citizens to danger, when the bills of mortality show that her citizens, by forties and fifties at a time, and an unexpected grave amidst the darkness of night beneath the turbid waves of the Mississippi; or, if they escape the perils of the water, are left to die by inches upon its bleak shores, when these accidents might have been prevented if the Government had performed its duty, and the fithers and mothers, and children who are sleeping the long sleep of death beneath its restless sands, might still be active vigorous citizens, brightening the countenance of their friends with their presence, and dispensing hope, comfort, and happiness to those who are now mourning their loss amid anguish and privation.

Mr. Speaker, a person who has not seen the Lower Mississippi when it was swollen with the floods in the spring, or when it was at low water in the fall, can form no adequate idea of the dangers of its navigation. When swollen it appears as though by some convulsion of Nature an inland sea, a mountain of sand, and a forest had been dissolved together, and their liquid mass of yellow lava was rushing to the ocean over the crater of a subterranean fire. The fowler hunts no game upon its bosom; the angler sports no fly to tempt the few fish which are to be found in its waters; and the boldest swimmer seeks not to bathe in its treacherous currents. In many places, owing to the cross currents and under-tow, the man who, by accident or design, plunges into its waves, never rises to the surface, and will not until the waters shall give in their dead. At low water, sawyers are seen, which were not discoverable or dangerous during the high water; and bars are visible in all directions, which in their continual fluctuations expose snags before unknown to the pilot; its banks in most places cannot be scaled, owing to their precipitancy and to the crumbling nature of the materials of which they are composed. If a traveller should pass through the steamboat grave yard in low water, as I have, he would perceive the wrecks of steamboats lying as profusely around as logs in our forests; and amidst the breaks in the water, and the eddies which are formed by sunken vessels, the boat, though propelled as slowly as possible to overcome the current, found as much difficulty to thread its way amongst the wrecked palaces rotting beneath the waves, which were once the pride but are now the dread of the fearless boatman, as a stranger has to pick his cautious path in an old grave yard without rashly treading upon the ashes of the dead.

The character of the Upper Mississippi and of its principal tributaries, such as the Illinois, Rock, Des Moines, and Iowa rivers, is essentially different. Their waters are never muddied and their channels never change, and on either bank the soil is as fertile and the landscape as beautiful as any that ever gladdened the eye of a farmer, or delighted the imagination of the lover of Nature. The obstacles to the navigation of the Upper Mississippi consist chiefly of the rocks which lie in the crooked channel of the river at the Des Moines and Rock Island rapids, which render the navigation exceedingly dangerous in an ordinary stage of water, and altogether prevent the passage of steamers in extreme low water. Although this is but a true statement of the dangers which now accompany the navigation of those streams, they can nearly all be easily removed by snag boats on the Lower and by proper improvements on the Upper Mississippi, and they should be removed without delay in justice to the West; for it should be borne in mind by every member that the Mississippi is as necessary and as useful to the people of the west, for the purpose of travel and transporting their property, as the ocean is to the inhabitants of the Atlantic States. It is the main outlet for the products of two as large a scope of country as lies east of the Alleghenies, and in usefulness and importance to the commerce and intercourse of this nation, is scarcely to be rated second to the broad ocean itself.

Some gentleman has objected to this resolution under consideration because it does not specify the amount which will be required to keep the snag boats in operation, and he fears it will involve some enormous appropriation. If that gentleman had but examined the documents laid upon his table accompanying the President's message, at page 212 he would have discovered that the estimates were already submitted by Colonel Long, giving the precise information he desires. I will read some of the items:

Employment of five snag boats nine months, at $2,100 per month for each boat	$77,700
Repairs and outfit of the same, &c.	6,000
Employment of two steam-machines nine months, at $2,100 per month for each boat	19,800
Repairs, &c. of the same	3,000
Construction of two small abutments or transports, of light draught, to serve as tow-boats, and to be in the service, at $8,000 dollars each	16,000
Employment of same nine months, at $800 per month	14,000
Then are stated estimates of surveys for the different rivers, and the following general item:
Constructing dams, improving channels, and various other operations not now definable, say	53,220
Making the whole amount estimated at	$223,000

It will be seen that the amount required to keep the snag boats in operation is but a trifling sum, when compared with the revenues of the Government or the vast interests at stake. Let me now call the attention of the House to the estimates of appropriations submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury for the ensuing year. They will be found to consist of the following items:

Civil list, foreign intercourse, and miscellaneous	$2,685,067
Army proper	3,113,920
Fortifications, Ordnance, &c.	4,091,480
Indian department	1,068,318
Pensions	1,098,050
Naval establishment	8,894,007

Making a total of $21,850,844. By examining page 37 of the same document No. 6, under the head of Harbors, rivers, roads, &c., the particular appropriations which are estimated to be required by the Heads of Departments having charge of this branch of service are stated at length. These improvements are situated on the seaboard, the northern lakes, and the western rivers, and I will give some of the items:

For continuing the improvement of the harbor at Chicago, Illinois	$30,000
For harbor at Milwaukee, Wisconsin	25,000
For harbor at Buffalo, New York	50,000
For Delaware Breakwater	100,000
For continuing improvement of the Hudson river, New York	50,000
For Cape Fear river, N. Carolina	40,000
For continuing improvements at the harbor of St. Louis, Mo.	30,000
For continuing the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri, Mississippi, Ohio, and Arkansas rivers	413,500
For the Cumberland road in Ohio	100,000
For do do Indiana	150,000
For do do Illinois	150,000

Making, with other improvements, the gross estimate of $1,153,330. In the estimates there are some works omitted which I think should be specified, but this is not the time to urge them before this House.

We are again met with the objection that the estimates of appropriations are altogether too large and must be reduced. Well, sir, I will heartily join gentlemen in adopting the utmost economy which is consistent with the interests of the Government. I ask for no extravagant appropriations, and do not wish to see any wild reckless scheme of improvement adopted by Congress. If the House desire to cut down the estimate one-half it may be very well. But I wish to know where gentlemen are going to begin. Do they design to carry out the views said to be entertained by the Committee of ways and means to cut off all appropriations for harbors, rivers and roads? If so, we will never submit to it. Why, sir, some gentlemen will vote millions for the protection of our foreign commerce, but hesitate at granting thousands for the protection of internal commerce. They can swallow without difficulty a whole line of fortifications on salt water, and take down an entire fleet at a gulp, yet they strain and choke at the bare sight of a fresh water snag boat. It is strange how this approximation to salt water amplifies their legislative digestion.

The west pays an average of three millions of dollars annually into the public Treasury for public lands. The very money which is carried by emigrants to the west goes to enrich the coffers of the Government in payment for lands, and finds its way back again to the east, to be there expended for fortifications, light-houses, and the navy. Besides this continual drain, we pay our fair share of the revenue of the country, collected on the foreign goods which are consumed in the west. There are more than six millions of people concerned in the improvement of the western waters, and we think—yes we know—that we have a right to share some small portion of the benefits of these expenditures of the Government. We are entitled to an equal share of the appropriations made by the Government; but though we ask less, we will not rest satisfied with nothing. All that we ask is, that if the estimates of appropriations are cut down by Congress, that the appropriations for the West be not reduced below the average allowed to other portions of the service. If the estimates are reduced one half, we will be content to take our half in the west; if they are not reduced so much, we must have our fair proportion. To demand less than this would be unworthy of the people we represent.

Some of the members interested in the improvement of the Lakes and the Hudson river object to this resolution because it is confined to asking appropriations for the western rivers, and they fear that if we succeed their improvements will be overlooked. I now tell these gentlemen that, so far as my vote is concerned, I am disposed to act on the most catholic principles. The State which I represent in part is connected in her interests with every section of this Union. The Mississippi, which washes its Western shore for five hundred miles, affords us a market, although a most uncertain one, for most of our surplus products. The Ohio, on our southern border, gives us a communication with the Middle States, and upon it are transported most of the emigrants who come to our prairies and most of the goods which are needed for our supplies. We border upon the Northern lakes, upon which a large trade is already carried on from the port of Chicago and when the Illinois and Michigan canal, which is being constructed over one of the carrying places mentioned in the ordinance, and upon which the State of Illinois has expended five millions of dollars, shall be completed, which I earnestly hope will be at no distant day, there will then be transported on the lakes one-half of the surplus products of Illinois. I can assure the gentleman from New York that I shall not stop to inquire into the mooted point as to the size of the Hudson river, nor whether it is situated in one State or runs through a dozen. Although I have never been upon its shores, I know that it is an important link of communication between the seaboard and the West, and there is not a week, in the business season of the year, when there is not transported upon it property belonging to and destined for Illinois. The improvement of the Hudson, and as of all other rivers similarly situated, and acting as connecting links between different sections of the Union, have ever been considered heretofore, and always should be considered hereafter, as great national highways, demanding the fostering protection of the General Government.

Mr. Speaker, whilst I make these statements, I must also be permitted to say that I do not wish to enter into a system of log-rolling to carry through this measure. I have seen the evils of that system carried to the extreme, in the legislation of my own State, and we are now suffering too severely from its unfortunate results for me to be willing to see it adopted here. But, sir, as I am willing to do justice to all sections of the Union, when a proper opportunity is presented, I ask gentlemen from every quarter of the House to aid in the passage of this resolution, and thus give us some evidence that the western waters shall not continue to be what they have been—a reproach to the Government, and a burial place for the bodies and property of our citizens.

There can be obtained at this office the first, second, third and fourth volumes of the Times and Seasons, also most of the odd numbers, if subscribers should need any, to make their volumes complete.

THE NEIGHBOR.

WEDNESDAY, FEB. 7, 1844.

WHO SHALL BE OUR NEXT PRESIDENT?

This is an enquiry which to us as a people, is a matter of the most paramount importance, and requires our most serious, calm, and dispassionate reflection. Executive power when correctly wielded, is a great blessing to the people of this great commonwealth, and forms one of the firmest pillars of our confederation. It watches the interests of the whole community with a fatherly care; it wisely balances the other legislative powers, when over-ruled by party spirit, or sectional feeling; it watches with jealous care our interests and commerce with foreign nations, and gives tone and efficacy to legislative enactments. The President stands at the head of these United States, and is the mouth-piece of this vast republic. If he be a man of an enlightened mind, and a capacious soul—if he is a virtuous man, a statesman, a patriot, and a man of unflinching integrity; if he possesses the same spirit that fired the souls of our venerable sires, who founded this great commonwealth, and wishes to promote the universal good of the whole republic, he may indeed be made a blessing to community. But if he prostrates his high and honorable calling, to base and unworthy purposes; if he makes use of the power which the people have placed in his hands for their interests, to gratify his ambition, for the purpose of self-aggrandisement, or pecuniary interest; if he meekly panders with demagogues, loses sight of the interests of the nation, and sacrifices the union on the altar of sectional interests or party views, he renders himself unworthy of the dignified trust reposed in him, debases the nation in the eyes of the civilized world, and produces misery and confusion at home. When the wicked rule, the people mourn.

There is perhaps no body of people in the United States who are at the present time more interested about the issue of the Presidential contest, than are the Latter Day Saints. And our situation in regard to the two great political parties, is a most novel one. It is a fact well understood, that we have suffered great injustice from the State of Missouri, that we have petitioned to the authorities of that state for redress in vain; that we have also memorialized congress, under the late administration, and have obtained the heartless reply that "congress has no power to redress your grievances." After having taken all the legal and constitutional steps that we can, we are still groaning under accumulated wrongs. I there no power any where to redress our grievances? Missouri lacks the disposition, and we both lack the disposition and power () and thus fifteen thousand inhabitants of these United States, can with impunity be dispossessed of their property, have their houses burned, their property confiscated, many of their numbers murdered, and the remainder driven from their homes, and left to wander as exiles in this boasted land of freedom and equal rights, and after appealing again and again, to the legally constituted authorities of our land for redress, we are coolly told by our highest tribunals, "we can do nothing for you." We have paid hundreds of thousands of dollars into the coffers of congress for their lands, and they stand virtually pledged to defend us in our rights, but they have not done it. If a man steals a dollar from his neighbor, or steals a horse or a hog, he can obtain redress; but we have been robbed by wholesale, the most daring murders have been committed, and we are coolly told that we can obtain no redress. If a steam boat is set on fire, on our coast by foreigners, even when she is engaged in siding and abetting the enemies of that power, it becomes a matter of national interference, and legislation; or if a foreigner, as in the case of McLeod, is taken on our land and tried for supposed crimes committed by him against our citizens, his nation interferes, and it becomes a matter of negotiation and legislation; but our authorities can calmly look on and see the citizens of a county butchered with impunity—they can see two counties dispossessed of their inhabitants, their houses burned and their property confiscated, and when the cries of fifteen thousand men, women and children salute their ears, they deliberately tell us we can obtain no redress. Hear it therefore ye mobsters! proclaim it to all the scoundrels in the Union: let a standard be erected around which shall rally all the ruffians of the land; assemble yourselves, and rob at pleasure; murder all you are satisfied with blood, drive men women and children from their homes, there is no law to protect them, and congress has no power to redress their grievances, and the great father of the Union (the President) has not got an ear to listen to their complaints.

What shall we do under this state of things? In the event of either of the prominent candidates, Van Buren or Clay, obtaining the Presidential chair, we should not be placed in a better situation. In speaking of Mr. Clay, his politics are diametrically opposed to ours; he inclines strongly to the old school of federalists, and as a matter of course, would not favor our cause, neither could we conscientiously vote for him. And we have yet stronger objections to Mr. Van Buren, on other grounds. He has long been the old song of congress—"congress has no power to redress your grievances." But did the matter rest here it would not be so bad. He was in the Presidential chair at the time of our former difficulties. We appealed to him on that occasion, but we appealed in vain, and his sentiments are yet unchanged. But all these things are tolerable in comparison to what we have yet to state. We have been informed from a respectable source, that there is an understanding between Mr. Benton, of Missouri, and Mr. Van Buren, and a conditional compact entered into, that if Mr. Benton will use his influence to get Mr. Van Buren elected, that Van Buren when elected, shall use his executive influence to wipe away the stain from Missouri, by a further persecution of the Mormons, and wreaking out vengeance on their heads, either by extermination, or by some other summary process. We could scarcely credit the statement, and we hope yet for the sake of humanity, that the suggestion is false; but we have too good reason to believe that we are correctly informed.

If then this is the case can we conscientiously vote for a man of this description, and put the weapons into his hands to cut our throat with? We cannot; and however much we might wish to sustain the democratic nomination we cannot—we will not vote for Van Buren. Our interests, our property, our lives and the lives of our families are too dear to us to be sacrificed at the shrine of party spirit, and to gratify party feelings. We have been sold once in the State of Missouri, and our liberties bartered away by political demagogues through executive intrigue, and we wish not to be betrayed again by Benton and Van Buren.

Under these circumstances the question arises, who shall we support? GENERAL JOSEPH SMITH. A man of sterling worth and integrity and of enlarged views; a man who has raised himself from the humble walks in life to stand at the head of a large, intelligent, respectable, and increasing society, that has spread not only in this land, but in distant nations; a man whose talents and genius, are of an exalted nature, and whose experience has qualified him every way adequate to the onerous duty. Honorable, fearless, and energetic; he would administer justice with an impartial hand, and magnify, and dignify the office of chief magistrate of this land; and we feel assured that there is not a man in the United States more competent for the task.

One great reason that we have for pursuing our present course is, that at every election we have been made a political target for the filthy demagogues in the country to shoot their loathsome arrows at. And every story has been put into requisition to blast our fame, from the old fabrication of "walk on the water" down to "the murder of ex-Governor Boggs." The journals have teemed with this filthy trash, and even men who ought to have more respect for themselves; men contending for the gubernatorial chair, have made use of terms so degrading, so mean, so humiliating, that a billingsgate fisherman would have considered himself disgraced with. We refuse any longer to be thus bedaubed for either party; we tell all such to let their filth flow in its own legitimate channel, for we are sick of the loathsome smell.

Gentlemen, we are not going either to "murder ex-Governor Boggs," nor a Mormon in this state for not giving us his money; nor are we going to "walk on the water;" nor "draw a woman;" nor "defraud the poor of their property;" nor send "destroying angels after Gen. Bennett to kill him;" nor "marry spiritual wives;" nor commit any other outrageous act; this election to help any party with, you must get some other persons to perform these kind offices for you for the future.—We withdraw.

Under existing circumstances we have no other alternative, and if we can accomplish our object well, if not we shall have the satisfaction of knowing that we have acted conscientiously and have used our best judgment; and if we have to throw away our votes, we had better do so upon a worthy, rather than upon an unworthy individual, who might make use of the weapon we put in his hand to destroy us with.

Whatever may be the opinions of men in general, in regard to Mr. Smith, we know that he need only to be known, to be admired; and that it is the principles of honor, integrity, patriotism, and philanthropy, that has elevated him in the minds of his friends, and the same principles if seen and known would beget the esteem and confidence of all the patriotic and virtuous throughout the union.

Whatever therefore be the opinions of other men our course is marked out, and our motto from henceforth will be GENERAL JOSEPH SMITH.

PUBLIC MEETING.

On Friday evening last a public meeting was held in the hall of Joseph Smith, at which a public address of General Joseph Smith, to the citizens of the United States was read by Judge Phelps. The address is certainly an able document, big with meaning and interest, clearly pointing out the way for the temporal salvation of this union, showing what would be our best policy, pointing out the rocks and quicksands where our political bark is in danger of being wrecked, and the way to escape it and evincing a knowledge and foresight of our political economy; worthy of the writer.

Appropriate remarks were made by several gentlemen after the reading of the address. From the (Reg) Weekly Dispatch. THE REVIVAL OF THE INQUISITION AND OF PERSECUTION. MR. EDITOR:—In your paper of last week you inserted exclusively an article of much importance; it was an extract from the Malta Times, a copy of which had been sent you by a correspondent from the Mediterranean. It is little to the honor of the London press, that this important article has not been copied in its columns. I allude to the revived persecution of the Jews in Ancona. If persecution be allowed to commence it will soon make rapid strides, and we shall have all the horrors of the good old times revived among us. Persecution can never be confined within its limits;—it will exist at all, and it is boundless. With respect to the Court of Inquisition, it was the glory of the immortal Napoleon that, wherever he went, he destroyed it; and to the shame and disgrace of the Duke of Wellington, it is recorded, that wherever he was successful he restored or allowed to be restored, this detestable Court of Priests. When the illustrious Emperor possessed Spain and Portugal, the Courts of Inquisition in both countries, were annihilated. When the Duke of Wellington drove the French out of those countries, the Inquisition revived in all its horrors. It may be truly said, that the march of Napoleon was that of liberality; whilst the progress of the Duke of Wellington was always that of absolute tyranny.

The revival of the Inquisition at Ancona is a fearful feature of the times. This hateful Court of Priests has its sittings and proceedings in secret; there is no appeal from its horrible decisions, and the chief judge has a power known to no other court in the world. Its president can aggravate a sentence to any amount. In all other courts throughout Europe the Sovereign has the prerogative of mitigating, but certainly not of increasing, a penal sentence; but in this terrible court of the priests the Inquisitor has the power of augmenting the punishment to any extent he pleases. This, of course, renders a trial, at best, a mere mockery. The sentence of the Court generally consists in torture, and the Grand Inquisitor, my increase this torture to the utmost extent of his disposition.

The Inquisition is re-established at Ancona, and its first proceeding is against the Jews.—Ancona is the third city in the Pope's dominions. It contains about 25,000 inhabitants—an immense number for a city of the dominions of this wretched sovereign, called the Pope. A great portion of the population are Jews, Greeks and Mohammedans. It has a cathedral and churches innumerable. Its manufactures are in the hands of the Jews, to whom the town owes all its prosperity. Now comes out a proclamation against these Jews, the sole object of which is to plunder them by extorting bribes for getting rid of this proclamation. In most parts of Europe liberality towards the Jews, for half a century at least, has been a prominent feature of the age. The French emancipated them as we did the Irish Catholics. In England, our Queen, very much to her honor, has conferred rights upon the Jews. We have had, we are glad to say, Jews as High Sheriffs of counties, and even of London itself; but the spirit of persecution must, like a pestilence, break out somewhere, and in the Pope's dominions it is now directed against the Jews of Ancona. The real motives of the priests, of course, consists in a knowledge that the Jews are worth plunder. By this edict of the Pope's Inquisition, a Jew is prohibited from marrying with a Christian; a Jew is not allowed to eat with a Christian, or to visit a Christian family. He is not permitted to employ Christian men, women, or children. We fancy that this will prove sadly detrimental to the Christians, for the Jews are the great capitalists—the money men—and employ half the town, and this part of the edict will throw the Catholic population of Ancona out of employment. It is really dreadful to know that such a hateful spirit of persecution can exist in any part of Christendom. The Jews are confined to a district of the town, and they are prohibited from employing Christian nurses, or Christian domestic servants, under the pain of fines and penalties, according to the Pontifical constitution. As we placed the Pope on his truncheon throne at an immense expense, we see not why we should not exercise a discretion in checking such enormities. Why should English gold have been spent, and English blood have been spilled, to establish such a system of Jewish tyranny? One section of the edict amounts to the ludicrous. It enacts that all Jews possessed of property must alienate that property by bond-fide contracts, and within the space of three months, or otherwise the whole property will be forfeited to the Sacred Court of Inquisition. Is not this enough to make the English people alive to religious persecution? The principle fully exists in this country, although it is not carried to quite as great an extent. The Jews are prohibited from eating with Christians, or sleeping out of their quarters, and from permitting Christians to sleep within them. Another clause of the edict prohibits the Jews from visiting Christians without a license, but the license being paid for, the Jews may visit where they please. Then, these Israelites are prohibited from trafficking in sacred things, or in trading in books of any sort whatever. These chosen people are forbidden to read any thing. This, I suppose, is a step in the progress of education—in the march of intellect. I will give the English public an idea of the horrible nature of this Catholic edict of the Inquisition.—"XI. That the Jews in carrying their dead to the grave, must not use any religious rite, or public pomp, and especially must abstain from saying prayers, or displaying torches, or other lights in the streets, and out of the Jewish quarter, under the pain of 100 scudi, the loss of the wax lights, and other things, to which the nearest relation shall be subjected." Such are the proceedings of what is called, "The Sacred Inquisition of Ancona."

The priests, of course, have the power of granting licences to the Jews for breaking all the orders of this edict of the Sacred Inquisition, and as the Jews are the only active, wealthy, and useful portion of Ancona, of course the priests make a good revenue of their licences. Such a case as this ought to open the eyes of the English public as to the spirit of priestcraft, which is rampant in this country as it is in Ancona, only it assumes a very different name.

VOLCANO IN GEORGIA.

The editor of the Athens (Ga.) Banner has been informed by a gentleman in whom he places the most implicit confidence, that there is a mountain in Rabun county, in that state, which is now throwing out immense quantities of very black, dense smoke, and manifests the appearance of being volcanic. It is said that the smoke issues through fissures in the rocks,

THE STATE TRIALS.

Sir:—The state prosecutions in Ireland are causing so much general excitement as to the probable termination that I beg of you to notice the following very curious remarks. They would, I think, rather surprise those who are looking for the end of the trials.

On dit, that O'Connell can bring forward three millions of witnesses. Now, supposing this, we would allow the Court of Queen's Bench to sit six days in the week, and fifty-two weeks in the year, it would take upwards of ninety-six years to examine them, at the rate of one hundred witnesses per day. We will not deal in such large numbers, but at once deduct one million of witnesses, and even then it would take sixty-four years and upwards to examine them. We will go further still, and deduct another million, and even then the poor lawyers would be "fagged out," for they would only have a thirty-two years' job of it. Now, supposing the great agitator, instead of giving the poor lawyers a ninety or a hundred years' job, would think of mitigating it to ten years' trial, the "poor fellows," in this case would have to examine about three hundred and twelve thousand witnesses, and so on.

Now, if O'Connell is at liberty to bring forward as many witnesses as he pleases, and with plenty of the "implement of war" to carry on the trial, there is no doubt that he will defeat and tire out the whole of her majesty's great councillors.

If Mr. Attorney-General Smith never had a long job before, I think he will sicken before he gets half through the present case; and I think the sooner the indictments are quashed the better. The briefs and all those kind of documents would be regularly published before the trials were finished.—Liverpool Standard.

I remain, sir, your most obedient servant, T. C.

THE OJIBWAY INDIANS AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

Thursday morning a party of Ojibway North American Indians, viz. three females and four males, came to the castle, conducted by Mr. Catlin, the celebrated traveller, and were presented to her majesty, and his Royal Highness Prince Albert, and his Royal Highness the Duke of Kent; the gentlemen and ladies of the court being also present. After which the chief made a speech in his own native language, (which was translated by Mr. Catlin, who acted as interpreter,) describing the loyalty of his tribe, and the gratification they experienced at seeing the Queen of England. Afterwards they danced several of their national dances to their own music, which consisted of a sort of tambour and bells, to the great amusement of her majesty. They were all dressed in their national costume, which was exceedingly grotesque. Previously to leaving the castle they were regaled with the old English fare, roast beef and plum pudding, to which both ladies and gentlemen did ample justice, handling the knife and fork with admirable dexterity. They then lighted their pipes and departed for town, evidently much delighted with their reception at the castle.—Globe.

Cooking a Husband.

Many of our married lady readers are not aware how a good husband ought to be cooked so as to make a good dish of him. We have lately seen a recipe in an English paper, contributed by one "Mary," which points out the modus operandi of preparing and cooking a husband. Mary states that many good husbands are spoiled in cooking. Some women go about it as if their lords were bladders, and "blow them up." Others keep them constantly in hot water, while others freeze them by conjugal coldness. Some smother them in the hottest beds of contention and variance, and keep them in pickle all their lives. These women always serve them up in sauce.—Now it cannot be supposed that husbands will be tender and good, managed in this way, but they are, on the contrary, quite delicious when preserved. Mary points out the manner thus:—"Get a jar, tinned, a jar of cheerfulness, (which, by the by, all good wives have at hand.) Being placed in it, set him near the fire of conjugal love, let the fire be pretty hot and the heat constant and regular. Cover him over with any quantity of affection, kindness, and subjection. Keep plenty of those things by you, and be very attentive to supply the place of any that may waste by evaporation, or any other cause. Garnish with modest, becoming familiarity, and innocent pleasantry, and if you add kisses or other confectionaries, accompanying them with a sufficient secrecy; and it would not be amiss to add a little prudence and moderation.—[Cheshire Republican.]

A New Prophet and King.

The Buffalo Commercial speaks of a new prophet who has arisen in that city. He is an Ethiopian who predicts the entire destruction of the whites on or before the 10th of April, 1844, and the restoration of the colored race to supreme power. He is to be King and his wife Queen under the new order of things. His palace is to be in Richmond, Va., and John Tyler and the Capitol are both to be overwhelmed. He says the Saviour made him this revelation six years ago—that Miller has but a very imperfect comprehension of the prophecies, and that the Abolitionists are entirely ignorant of the manner in which the slaves' bonds are to be broken. He starts for Richmond next month, to await the great issue!

Belair Castle.

The following statement will give some idea of the extent of the magnificent hospitality which on ordinary occasions prevails at the princely establishment of the Duke of Rutland:—During 18 weeks in 1840, there dined at his grace's table 1,307 persons, in the steward's room, 2,421; in the servant's hall, nursery and kitchen department, including comers and goers, 11,312 persons. Of leaves of bread there were consumed 3,333, and of meat 22,063 lb, exclusive of game. — [Manchester Guardian.]

King Louis Philippe is expected in England in two months, and the Queen of England is expected at Berlin and at Paris in the course of next spring.

The White Quakers.—A deputation from this body has just visited London. They have been extensively engaged in placarding the walls and boards at the west end of the town during the last week with some of their fanatical effusions, denouncing vengeance on all but the favored few. Their appearance in their white garb excites much curiosity. — [Weekly London newspaper.]

Female Clerks.—As mere clerks or accountants, young girls are beginning to be preferred to young men in public establishments in France, where no goods are sold nor orders given or received. I could mention one of the leading banking establishments in Paris, in which two daughters, one aged eighteen and the other twenty, of one of the principal partners, are daily to be seen at the desk from the beginning to the close of business hours. What would a banker's daughter in London think, were she to be compelled daily to sit from ten till five in the banking house, with the day-book or ledger before her? She would just as soon submit to be placed in the pillory. And in many more establishments, where there is nothing but writing to do, young women will soon be taken in at fixed salaries in the room of young men. Experience proves them to be more steady, more careful, more assiduous in their application to the duties which devolve upon them, than young persons of our sex. Of late, indeed, a considerable number of young women have been employed in several government offices as regular salaried clerks. — [Paris and its People.]

Horrid treachery.—Poisoning Indians.—The following is an extract from the speech lately delivered by President Houston of Texas:

"I ask you to go back with me to '38. Our intercourse with the Indians was characterized by a flagrant violation of justice on our part. They came in among us peaceable and tranquil.

When they went home; traders went with them, packing poison, with a view to kill off all those who sat down to the first table for they do not treat their ladies with quite so much respect as we; they are ungallant, and always eat first. What was the result? Three hundred and fifty Camanches were poisoned and died! Many were poisoned, but some recovered.

The survivors burned the men who had thus treacherously sacrificed so many of their people.

This was proclaimed as a foul massacre of the whites, on the part of the Indians; but it was only murdering traders who, in fact had murdered them.

An Elephant on Teetotaler.—On Friday last the juvenile portion of the inhabitants of Whitby were thrown into uncommon excitement by an announcement of the bellman, viz. That a number of caravans containing wild beasts were on their road from Scarborough, and that among the rest was an immense elephant, which would positively draw its own caravan through the streets. After some three or four hours' impatient waiting, the sight seeing multitude had their utmost wishes realized; for Jimoonah came drawing his abode behind him, with as much ease as if it had been a common wheelbarrow. He was quartered upon mine host of the White Horse and Griffin, in Church-street, and made himself as much at home as could be expected upon such a limited acquaintance, and it was no small shot that his master had to pay for his night's entertainment. It appears Jimoonah liked a private apartment, and was in consequence shown into mine host's brewery which had been prepared for his special accommodation. Some time during the night, being seized with an uncommon draught, and suspecting from the nature of his quarters that good cheer must be at hand, the animal made search, and putting his foot through the head of a thirty gallon cask of porter, and finding it to his taste, speedily drank the contents. He next emptied a bin of beans, and when found next morning was making some further experiments upon a second cask of stout. Great was the keeper's astonishment at the sight of his ward, and greater still at the extent of mischief he had perpetrated; and had he been in a fit condition to receive correction, would doubtless have got it on the spot. — [Manchester Guardian.]

A child was born in New York, on the 18th inst, destitute of ears, nose and eyes. Its mouth was in the middle of the face. It lived about three hours. An inquest was held on the body and it was given up to the medical faculty.

A smart young student of anatomy remarked, in the hearing of his sister, that the reason there are so many old maids in the world, is all owing to their tight lacing—which so hardened their hearts as to make them impenetrable to the shafts of Cupid. And the reason there are so many old bachelors, retorted the sister, is because of their tight strapping which cannot get on their knees to declare their passion. — [Dime.]

A pleasing incident occurred lately in the Georgia Legislature. A new county had been laid off; and several names were proposed for it, among them that of Harrison, when Mr. Iverson arose and remarked, that he hoped all the others would be at once withdrawn—that Gen. Harrison was now no more—that though politically opposed to him, he had always regarded him as a good man, and revered his memory. Thereupon, the other names proposed were withdrawn and Harrison adopted.

Greatness.—A great mind retracts an error as soon as it is discovered. To persist in wrong, is absolute folly. Can it be degrading to acknowledge that we have discovered the truth?

Rather Curious.—A lady writes to a friend in Dumfries, that a draft sent by her brother in India came safely to hand through the Post-Office, after having been at the bottom of the sea in the Meinnon, and although the seal was so completely wasted along with the paper adjoining, that the letter in fact, was quite open.

FIVE HUNDRED SLAVES SHOT!

IMPORTANT FROM HAVANA.—The Brig Alabama, arrived at New Orleans, bringing dates to the 23d ult., which fully confirm the news relative to the lowering of export duties on coffee, molasses, and sugar. The news that the Queen of Spain was declared of age by the Cortes, was officially received in Havana, on the 21st Dec., and celebrated with due ceremony. The Captain General and the other officers attended church, where a Te Deum was chanted for the occasion.

The U. S. vessels Falmouth and Vincennes are still at Havana, and the report was current in the city that the English fleet from the North American station, were expected daily to rendezvous there. It gave no uneasiness, as their destination was presumed to be the Mexican coast.

The New Orleans Tropic contains an extract from a private letter received in that city, which contains an account of an insurrection among the negroes, in which 500 of them were slain. The following is the extract, though it may be proper to remark that it was not generally credited in New Orleans.

"Things here are getting worse and worse every day, it strikes me a change must come very soon. The negroes in the country give a great deal of trouble. They rose a day or two ago, upon the estates of the Aldama's, and the Alphonso's. It appears there is an extensive conspiracy, in which the slaves were engaged. Nearly five hundred negroes, in arms, were killed, and a large number of prisoners were taken. The Americans residing at Mantanzas have asked for an American man-of-war, to be in that port, in case they are compelled to flee the island."

Wonderful Event.—The anniversary of the treaty of Verun, was celebrated at Brandenburg, Germany, by a concert of seventy-two convoked Philharmonic Societies, eleven thousand strong. This chorus sang Mendelson's song of the Huntsman accompanied by 600 horns!!

STATE OF IOWA.—A memorial has been introduced into the Legislature of the Territory of Iowa, asking the Congress an appropriation of fifteen thousand dollars, to defray the charges of organizing a State Government, and designating the following for the boundaries of the state. It is to commence at the Mississippi river, opposite the middle of the main channel of the Des Moines; along the Mississippi to the St. Peters; along the St. Peters to the mouth of the Blue Earth river; up the Blue Earth, to its most westerly course; thence on a direct line to the source of Cactus river, at east branch of the Calumet or Sioux river; down the Cactus to the Missouri, down the Missouri to the line to be established between the Iowa and Missouri; by said line east to the river Des Moines; thence by the channel to the Des Moines to the Mississippi at the place of beginning. — [Mo. Rep.]

The Cincinnati Atlas says:—We learn from the Collector of this Port, that twenty one steamboats have been completed at Cincinnati, and have taken out their papers since the 1st of October; and five more will be finished in the course of the present month, which is at the rate of more than one a week, at an average cost of twenty thousand dollars each; the building of these boats has thus caused the distribution of half a million of dollars among our very meritorious Mechanics; also amongst our Hardware Cabinet Crockery, and Carpet dealers, Boat stores, &c. There is also the usual number of Boats on the stocks at this season, one of which will be the largest ever built on the river.

Pennsylvania State Debt.—According to the "Philadelphia North American," upwards of three thousand dollars has been raised for the purpose of "effecting a law, at this ensuing session of the Legislature of Pennsylvania, to legalize lotteries, the proposed object being to enable the State to liquidate its debts.

Eruption of Mount Vesuvius.—By the Neapolitan steamer, Francesco, from Malta Nov. 26, brings an account of the breaking forth of Mount Vesuvius. This mountain had been for some days heavily clapped with dense clouds; some rumblings were heard at times, resembling distant thunder, and many persons, especially on the west side, near Bronte, imagined they felt at intervals slight shocks of earthquake. On Saturday, about midnight, several violent explosions were heard; and fire was soon seen to ascend from near the mouth of the old crater, the stream of lava gradually increased in extent, and took a course towards the town of Bronte; luckily a few hills to its left served to turn its direction, which then flowed on towards the post road to Palermo. On Monday, this stream of liquid fire had attained the destructive breadth of upwards of two miles; it still flowed, destroying every thing in its path. The road to Palermo, is closed up, filled with burning lava. The sight is awful, grand, beautiful, yet terrific beyond description. It bids fair to be the most magnificent eruption of the last century. As yet its damages have been confined to a few houses and vineyards.

Frontier Settling in America.—Take the following case as an illustration of the process that is continually going on on the frontier. A man removes to the west; he purchases a piece of ground, builds a house, and devotes himself to the clearing and tillage of his forest acres.

"Ere long, he has rescued a farm from the forest, and has reared a family upon it. He then divides his land among his sons, if there be enough for a farm to each of them; if not, each receives money enough to buy one, as he comes of age. Some may settle on lands bestowed on them by their father; others preferring a change, may dispose of their portion, and proceed, most commonly unmarried, to 'the frontier country,' as it is called, that is, to those parts of the west, where the public lands are not yet sold. There he chooses out as much as he can pay for, receiving a title to it from the district land office, and proceeds to make for himself a home. This is likely to be in the spring. Having selected a spot for his dwelling, generally near some spring, or where water may be had by digging a well, he goes round, and makes the acquaintance of his neighbors, residing within the distance, it may be, of several miles. A day is fixed for building him a house, upon which those neighbors come, and render him such efficient help, that in a single day, he will find a log house constructed, and perhaps covered with clapboards, and having apertures cut out for the doors, windows, and chimney. He makes his floor at once of rough boards riven from the abundant timber of the surrounding forest, constructs his doors, and erects a chimney. Occupying himself, while interrupted in out-door work by rainy weather, in completing his house, he finds it in a few weeks tolerable comfortable; and, during fair weather, he clears the underwood from some ten or fifteen acres, kills the large trees by notching them round so as to arrest the rise of the sap, and sows the ground with Indian corn, or maize, as it is called in Europe. He can easily make, buy, or hire a plough, a harrow, and a hoe or two. If he find time, he surrounds his field with a fence of stakes. At length, after prolonging his stay until his crop is beyond the risk of serious injury from squirrels and birds, or from the growth of weeds, he shuts up his house, commits it to the care of some neighbor, living perhaps one or two miles off, and returns to his paternal home, which may be from fifty to three hundred miles distant from his new settlement. There he stays until the month of September, then marries, and with his young wife, a wagon and a pair of horses to carry their effects, a few cattle or sheep, or none, according to circumstances, sets out to sojourn for life in the wilderness. On arriving at his farm, he sows wheat or rye, among his standing Indian corn, then gathers in this last, and prepares for the winter. His wife shares all the incidents to this humble beginning. Accustomed to every kind of household work, she strives by the diligence of her fingers to avoid the necessity of going to the merchant who has opened his store at some village among the trees, perhaps some miles off, and there laying out the little money they may have left. With economy and health they gradually become prosperous.

The primitive log-house gives place to a far better mansion, constructed of hewn logs, or of boards, or of brick, or stone. Extensive and well-fenced fields spread around, ample barns stored with grain, stalls filled with horses and cattle, flocks of sheep, and herds of hogs, all attest the increasing wealth of the owners. Their children grow up, perhaps to pursue the same course, or as their inclinations may lead, to choose some other occupation, or to enter one of the learned professions. — [Rev. R. Baird's, Religion, in the U. S.]

An ordinance entitled an ordinance to repeal certain ordinances therein mentioned. Whereas an ordinance entitled 'an ordinance for the extra case of Joseph Smith and others' passed Dec. 8th 1843, and whereas the ordinance entitled 'an ordinance to prevent unlawful search and seizure of person and property by foreign process in the city of Nauvoo, passed Dec. 21, 1843,' have had their desired effect in preserving the peace, happiness, persons and property of the citizens of Nauvoo according to their intent and meaning, Therefore

Sec. 1. Be it ordained by the City Council of the city of Nauvoo, that the aforesaid ordinances are hereby repealed. Sec. 2. And be it further ordained that nothing in the first section of this ordinance shall be so construed as to give license or liberty to any foreign officer or other person or persons to illegally disturb the peace, happiness or quiet of any citizen of said city, any ordinance to the contrary notwithstanding, under a penalty of not less than five dollars nor more than five hundred dollars or imprisonment six months in the city prison. Passed Feb. 12, 1844.

JOSEPH HORNE.
NOTICE TO EMIGRANTS AND LATTER-DAY SAINTS GENERALLY.

I feel it my duty to say to the brethren generally, and especially those who are emigrating to this place, that there is in the hands of the Trustee in Trust, a large quantity of lands, both in the city and adjoining Townships in this county, which is for sale—some of which belongs to the church and is designed for the benefit of the poor, and also to liquidate debts owing by the church, for which the Trustee in Trust is responsible. Some also is land which has been consecrated for the building of the Temple, and some for the Nauvoo House.

If the brethren who move in here and want an inheritance will buy their lands from the Trustee in Trust, they will hereby benefit the poor, the Temple and the Nauvoo House, and even then only be doing that which is their duty and which I know, by considerable experience, will be vastly for their benefit and satisfaction in days to come. Let all the brethren therefore, when they move into Nauvoo, consult President Joseph Smith the Trustee &c., and purchase their lands of him, and I am bold to say that God will bless them and will hereafter be glad they did so.

We hold ourselves ready, at any time to wait upon the brethren and show them the lands belonging to the church and Temple &c., and can be found any day either at President Joseph Smith's Bar Room or the Temple Recorder's Office, at the Temple.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

WHERE is the Good Samaritan? Where the true Philanthropist? Is there no balm in Gilead? Have they not yet been found? If you have not found them, seek for the remedies offered to the afflicted, by Dr. James M. Martien's Invaluable Remedy for the cure of Fevers.

For Dr. James M. Martien's Anti-Bilious Universal Life Pills.

For Dr. James M. Martien's Anti-Dyspeptic and Anti-Consumptive Pills.

For Dr. James M. Martien's Never-failing Worm Destroying medicine.

For Dr. James M. Martien's Cephalic Snuff, for the cure of Nervous Headache, &c.

In these medicines, the afflicted will find a treasure which is infinitely of greater value to the sick and debilitated, than either silver or gold. Truly may it be said that, in their curative virtues may be found the Good Samaritan! the true Philanthropist! the balm of Gilead! the Poor Man's Wealth! the Sick Man's Comfort! and by the proper and timely use of which, every man may become his own Physician!

From earliest childhood, he practiced successfully the art of healing; and in defiance of opposition, by friends and relatives, he succeeded in studying the art and science of medicine; and after untiring industry and immense research, and after having reached riper years, and traveled among numerous tribes of Indians, and visited many and various climates, Dr. James M. Martien is fully persuaded that he has now realized his fondest expectations; that the object of all his toil, labor and hope, has been accomplished; and that he will be regarded by all future generations as the true Philanthropist; as having been the instrument, under the direction of an overruling Providence, of rendering and having rendered the greatest good to the greatest number, will be cheerfully conceded.

City of Nauvoo:

The subscriber takes great pleasure in calling the attention of the public, to the above invaluable remedies; believing that they are a medicine that will tend to secure the health of this city. That they act most mildly, and yet most efficaciously; in uniformity with the laws of nature; and that they are composed of mild herbs. Knowing from experience that no Pill possesses more virtue in their curative properties. Their worth can only be estimated by a fair trial and by following the accompanying directions. The undersigned can produce a host of the most respectable testimony in their favor, and doubts not but a discerning public, will, in the use of them, secure to themselves, that highest boon of heaven—health.

SHERMAN'S MEDICATED LOZENGES.

COUGH LOZENGES.

WORM LOZENGES.

The only infallible Worm medicine ever discovered. In over 400,000 cases they have never been known to fail. Many diseases arise from worms and occasion long and intense suffering and even death without their ever being suspected; grown persons are very often afflicted with them, and are doctored for various complaints, without any benefit, when one dose of these Lozenges would speedily cure them.

CAMPHOR LOZENGES.

For Nervous or Sick Head Ache, Palpitations of the Heart, lassitude and nervous affections generally. Persons traveling or attending large parties, will find the Lozenges really reviving, and imparting the buoyancy of youth—used after dispensation, they will restore the tone of the system generally, and remove all the unpleasant symptoms arising from too free living.

CATHARTIC LOZENGES.

The best Cathartic medicine for removing bile from the system and preventing attacks of the bilious and intermittent fever of this section of country.

FEVER AND AGUE LOZENGES.

A cure in all cases guaranteed or the money refunded.

SHERMAN'S POOR MAN'S PLASTER.

This Plaster, of which over 1,000,000 are sold yearly, is believed to be the best Plaster for rheumatism, lumbago, pain in the back, side, breast or any other part of the body, ever prepared, and its price (only 12 1/2 cents), brings it within the reach of every person in the community.

A large supply of these celebrated articles just received and for sale by

POETRY.

THE MONOPOLISTS' LIST.

How the mockery stinks in the nostrils of Heaven,
How the arrogant falsehood insults the wide earth!
To the fiends in deep hell, for a moment 'tis given,
Mid their torment, to gibber in horrible mirth:
Oh! yes, 'tis a blessing that bread is so dear—
Yes, 'tis a comfort that rent is so high—
Give the thief man his chariot, the poor man his liver;
'Tis a fever, untaxed, to be suffered to die.

How long, ye vile slaves! chaffer route with the wine;
They are good enough, chaff! for your under-bread maw:
Earth's treasures are skimmed, when your masters would dine;
While ye starve by their merciful, master-made laws:
Toll, sweat, and make hunger their huge money-bags:
Self, train up your daughters to batten their lust;
As they roll, by in splendor, crouch, crouch in your rage;
As they tell at the banquet, pay thrice for your crust!

Oh, God's earth is fair; and a glimpse you may catch,
As you peer o'er the wall of some neighboring park,
Of lawn, grove and paddock—but lift not a latch,
Or be torn by the dogs at your footsteps that bark.
Sweet valley and glade, beautiful lake, stream and river,
Bestowed every turn in our evergreen vale:
Ye have heard they are lovely, but glanced at them never.
Save yolk'd like scorned beasts to uncomplacently toil.

Crawl on, ye vile slaves! not a sod is your own,
Of the soil where your fathers couched free as the air:
Not a bird dare ye shoot, where their footsteps have flown;
Not a fish dare you draw from the streams that were the rain:
With your sweat your land is rent; their scutcheon adorn,
And would you your heart's blood, as your hearts they have given;
You have asked for free bread—they refuse it with scorn.
If you starve at their will, you deserve it, by heaven!

[From the Organ]

THE TARTAN PLAID.

Two Scotchmen met the other day,
Just as the Kirk was calling—Faire ye Jock!—Faire ye Dave!
I'm in a mood for railing.

What trick the folk has he about,
To wear our plaids I dinna ken,
As I and lassies now are dressed,
Rob Roy might claim them for his ain.

Or Roderick Dhu and Ither Chiefs
Micht here find followers and a band;
They seem to be aye very loyal—
Look there! some wear Victoria.

It makes me mad to see our plaids
Wore mixt maxied a through ither
By those, ye ken as well as me,
Had no'er a fit among the heather.

Hoolie ye, Jock! hear me awie,
And dinna bein sic a passion,
But look around you, and ye'll see
They're rights the best—it is the fashion.

That German girl that's stotting by,
Has thrown aside the flaming red,
And looks as Scotch as you or I;
For now, you see, she wears the plaid.

That Irish girl now dressed in plaid,
That looks as strapping and sae braw,
Has laid aside the emerald green,
And stown mony a heart awa.

Yon Yankee lass that's gone aheed,
Sae gaudy dressed in Tartan screen,
Nae doubt mak's mony a loving sigh,
Wi' glancin' o'er her paiky eyne.

In short, dear Jock, ye man allow
It makes me a' look by ythe and pritty;
It makes the auld lark young again,
And even makes the dulle seem witty.

But just as Jock was near convinced,
Comes hoddin' by an unco figure,
All rigged wi' plaid from tap to toe—
She turned her face—she was a nigger!

TENURE OF LAND IN IRELAND.—PRESENT ASPECT OF THE COUNTRY.

This is not the time to view Ireland in an easy chair. The awful and gloomy spectacle which that country at this moment exhibits, strongly resembles the horrid picture which France presented on the eve of that sanguinary revolution which involved the throne, the Constitution, the altar, and the property of that country in one common and general ruin. Events are crowding upon events in Ireland, which threaten to shatter to pieces the frame-work of society, and leave life and property not worth one day's purchase. War is waged against all power—revolt is proclaimed against all lawful authority—and the most brutal, sanguinary outrages are perpetrated in the open daylight. On the other hand, the country has all the appearance of a threatened siege—proclamations are issued—arms are collected—cartridges are made—tons of ammunition are imported—cannon is cast, drawn out, and pointed against the people—barricades are erected—every barrack and military outpost is loop-holed and strengthened. Such is the awful state of Ireland at this momentous crisis. All who are anxious for the happiness, the moral and physical improvements of the sister island must deplore the wretched inhuman policy which has reduced a nation, so blessed by nature, to such misery, wretchedness, and despair. Pitt declared that the object of the Union was to communicate to Ireland the skill, the industry, and capital, which have raised this country to such a pitch of opulence. Has the Union realised these golden dreams of the Minister? The hoarse murmur of the impending thunder that threatens to burst over Ireland's head, and the rapid wasting away of its population answer the question. According to a recent return, it appears that the increase of the population of Ireland from 1831 to 1841 was 557,702 less than it had been in the 10 years preceding. The increase in England, during the same 10 years, was 2,004,794, which was more than one-twentieth upon the population of 1831. Thus it appears that the increase in England has been in the ratio of nearly three to one as compared with Ireland. What has caused this unnatural disparity between the two countries? Much of the calamity under which Ireland groans arises from the unnatural restrictive warfare that is carried on between landlord and tenant, which, substituting the subtleties of law for that line of right and wrong that should be observed between man and man, forces the tenant to look upon his landlord as his tyrant instead of his natural protector, and induces him to adopt every means to evade the payment of the rent that his landlord struggles to enforce. This anomalous relationship between landlord and tenant cannot be understood by their English brethren, whose relationships are cemented and strengthened by mutual kindness, confidence, and reciprocal advantage. In England the interests of landlord and tenant are combined, from a consciousness on the part of the latter that a liberal outlay in the permanent improvement of the soil will not fail to insure a corresponding generosity from the landlord, while the Irish proprietor has no other interest in the welfare of him who cultivates the soil beyond the gold that he can coin out of the tenant's skill and industry. In England each cottager holds his land by a safe and independent tenure; in Ireland many cottagers are tenants under one lease, and are jointly and severally responsible for the rent. Hence arise innumerable disputes about property, and its boundaries amongst the tenants, and frequently one tenant is seized upon for another, though the sufferer has paid his rent, and very often all the tenants are ejected from the holdings, should one of them prove a defaulter. In England the cottager or small farmer, although but a tenant-at-will, improves and cultivates his holding to the highest pitch, satisfied that both himself and children will remain in quiet possession, undisturbed by the whim, caprice, or avarice of the landlord. In Ireland no cottager or small farmer attempts, or would even dream to improve his holding, unless it be secured to him by a lease for fifty or one hundred years, well convinced that without such a protection he would have no guarantee that he would not be plundered of the advantages of his industry by a grasping landlord, or a grinding agent. Are not those instances of unparalleled injustice, cruelty and oppression more than calculated to drive the people into open rebellion against the laws which afford them no protection, and into acts of savage sanguinary revenge upon the oppressors and heartless tyrants who thus grind them to the dust? But these are not a tithe of the iron persecution to which the Irish people are subjected, and to which they will continue to be subjected, until there is a complete revision of the local system under which the tenure of land is at present regulated, and by which the labouring poor are, in the best parts of Ireland, daily and publicly perishing in the streets and highways, through want, disease, and infirmity, without any shelter for their heads, or any hope of the slightest alleviation of their calamities. This is a realization of the promise made by Pitt to the Irish, that the Union would admit them to an equal participation of all the rights and benefits of the Constitution. If class legislation be one of the blessings of this participation, the Irish enjoy it with a vengeance. It is to be hoped that the 'Landlord and Tenant Commission' will probe deep into the causes of these evils, and by prudent and skillful treatment prevent their recurrence. If they do this they will acquire a little to the gratitude of the Irish nation, which no time or circumstance can ever destroy.

Mesmerism was known to the ancient Egyptians. An English traveller, writing from Egypt, says—"It appears to have been well understood by the Egyptian hierarchy, not only from some of the effects we find recorded, but in one of the chambers whose hieroglyphics are devoted to medical subjects, we find a priest in the very act of that Mesmerism which is pretended to have been discovered a few years ago. The patient is seated in a chair, while the operator describes the Mesmeric passes, and an attendant waits behind to support the head when it is bowed in the mysterious sleep." The knowledge of Magnetism, according to the same authority, passed from Egypt to Greece, and it was while in a state of clairvoyance, that the Pythonesse gave out those responses which had so prodigious an effect upon the old world. It was also known to the Romans.

Awful Situation.—A notorious tippler, (says the Boston Courier) in a town not forty miles from Boston, returned home last washing-day, with a jug of rum, and staggering into his wife's domain, mistook a tub of well warmed water for a seat, and suddenly settled himself into it, so that his surging sides leaped merrily about him—he being a fast prisoner. In this predicament he called lustily for Nabby. His "gude wife" seeing his deep interest in her affairs, seized the jug, dashed around the philosopher, pouring its contents over his head—disregarding his piteous look, outstretched arms, and beseeching appeal of "Nabby, save it! Save it Nabby!" to which she replied, "Go it, Joe—long life to your honor," &c.

Discovery of Early French Gold Coin.—At a meeting of the Numismatic Society, on Thursday evening, Lord Albert Conyngham in the chair, a paper by Mr. Akerman was read on some Merovingian and other gold coins, discovered in the parish of Crondall, Hants, near an ancient encampment, called 'Caesar's Camp.' With the coins were found some jewelled ornaments and a gold chain. The coins belonging to the first race of the French kings and their moneyers. Many are capable of being satisfactorily appropriated to a variety of towns, such as Quentovic, Marsal, &c.; others are evident imitations of Roman coins. Many are quite new to the numismatist, and among these are some remarkable ones having on one side a full-faced beardless head and a cross, and on the other the word 'LXXVNI,' with a cross within a circle. It is well known that at the period of the Merovingian dynasty the coinage of England was in silver, but the coins in question seem to be an exception to the rule. Mr. Akerman remarked, that whatever may be their date, it will not be doubted that they are of English origin, and that their place of mintage was London. The fortunate possessor of the coins is Mr. C. E. Lefroy, of Evesham. [London Paper.]

Piracy in the East.—By the latest accounts received from Java, the expedition against the pirates, commanded by Capt. J. P. A. Coertzen, was to the south-east of Celebes, and had succeeded in destroying the retreats of the pirates in the islands of Tannah, Djampoa, and Kalcatoa, near Selayar, with thirty large pirate vessels, taking 40 pieces of cannon. Some days afterwards, the Hecla, discovered a great number of pirate vessels in a bay of the islands to the south-east of Celebes, when on seeing the Hecla, immediately put to sea, and attempted to save themselves by flight. Being soon overtaken by the Hecla (a steamer), an engagement ensued in the Strait of Bonerate; the pirates, seeing they could not escape, prepared to make a desperate resistance, and waited for the steamer. The pirates on this occasion fought with a degree of intrepidity of which there are few examples.

One of their largest vessels, on board of which was the serang, or paglimba of the pirates, and which, is said to have had a crew of 150 men, fell into our hands, with thirty seven slaves, among whom were eight women, five children, and five of the pirates, one of whom was the serang, who, however, afterwards died of his wounds; the others lost their lives. Another vessel with about one hundred men, having been much damaged by our balls, turned to the shore, and around; the crew fled up the country.

These two vessels were well provided with guns. The largest had thirteen mounted, two of which were six pounders. The other pirate vessel fled, favored by the approach of night and a high wind. We have to regret the loss of seven killed and twenty-six wounded. After the steamer fell in with the pirate vessels, and soon sunk one of them, the others retreated, and our people thought they were tired of them; when, after some debate, as it seems, having killed the women and thrown the bodies that were on board into the sea, resolved to conquer or die, they came on in greater numbers than before, and notwithstanding the destructive fire opened upon them, they boarded the steamer, where a deplorable conflict ensued, which in all probability, considering the great superiority of the pirates, would have ended to the disadvantage of the steamer, so that the Hecla would have been captured and the crew carried into slavery or put to the sword, had not the captain, with extraordinary presence of mind, thought of using the fire-engine to pour boiling water on the pirates. They, being quite naked, burnt and scalded, with fearful cries sought for safety or flight; so that the captain, who had not been able to use either his guns or his small fire arms, had now the opportunity of completing by his fire the destruction of the flying pirates and their vessels, are convinced that, if they had unhappily taken his majesty's steamer, they would have obtained a degree of power which might have had the most fatal consequences for coasting vessels and merchantmen.—[Dutch paper.]

The true History of the Outbreaks in Wales.—The Times reporter, in speaking of the Special Commission appointed to inquire into the grievances affecting the people of Wales, thus describes the cause that led to the recent disturbances. He says—"On Thursday, Mr. Edwards, of Sullyham, and a large body of his tenants, waited on the Commissioners, and stated their complaints and opinions. Generally they complained strongly against the increase in tithes since the Tithe Commutation Act, and against the tolls on lime and culm. The true source of the disturbances is to be found in the poverty of the people. The labourers are suffering from the operation of the New Poor Law Bill: the most abject poverty; the farmers are wretchedly poor in consequence of the high rents—they pay rents only payable in a season of artificially high prices. I was informed to-day that the average rental of land between here and Fishguard—the bleak wilderness of Pembrokeshire—the land of bogs and quagmires, of gorse bushes where there is a dry spot, and of rushes where there is not, is 11 per acre—land, from appearance, not worth a rent of 5s. I was yesterday over many fields of grass land, when every step I took sunk up to the ankles, down went the grass, and up started the mud and water. I asked, 'Why did not the tenants drain the land?'—this was wretched farm? The answer invariably was, 'Drain! they can hardly get bread and cheese, without burying their money in drains; and the landlords will do nothing?' The system of rents of farming, and of payment of labourers here appears to me to be generally this: from living with each other and living beyond their income the petty squires archly of 1400 or 1500 a year (and it is very few of them that have more) gradually get mortgages on their estates; they therefore, cannot afford to be liberal land lords. They employ agents to collect their rents—why? to avoid being pestered by the complaints of their tenants, and to be enabled to extract from them the utmost farthing without being brought into personal contact with them. The ones is then thrown on the agent; is the agent's fault. The agent gets paid a per centage on the amount of rents he obtains for his trouble. It is, therefore, his interest obviously to get as much rent as he can. When the tenants, therefore, complain that they are over-rated, a deaf ear is always turned to them—the agent's per centage is in jeopardy, and I have known instances when the agent has refused to make a reduction in the rents, even when the landlord has expressed his willingness to make it. Then comes the tenant's turn. The farm is undrained; the hedges are down; the land is over-cropped.—Why? He cannot afford to pay for labour—sufficient properly to cultivate his farm, and he gets out of the land all he can before he is ruined. In his turn he becomes an oppressor. He pays his labourers inadequately, and then in steps the New Poor Law to his aid to compel the labourers to submit to it; in fact, to enable the farmer to pay a higher rent by grinding the faces of the poor. By a calculating cruelty, I never heard of before, I am told that able bodied men are here paid 6d. per day (i. e. 3s. per week) and their food, which is considered to be an equivalent to 10d. a day, the usual wages in this county (Cardigan) and in most parts of Carmarthen, the labourer is necessarily so badly fed, that he cannot get through his work. In fact, that he does as little as he is paid for. He is, therefore, decently fed in order to get a fair amount of work of him, and the price of the food is subtracted from his wages, his wife and family being left to live, or rather to starve, on the balance paid to him. They have not to work, what becomes of them is immaterial, and the labourer's wife and four or five children may subsist as they best can, and clothe themselves on the pittance of 3s. a week. If the labourer grumbles at this where is his remedy? His master will give him no more, nor will any of the farmers here. If he says he will not sell his strength and the best of his days for such a sum, he has 'the workhouse test' before him. Gravel, and stonebreaking, and imprisonment, and separation from his family are his alternative. By the grinding oppression of this law, he is, therefore, compelled to accept a rate of wages one degree above starvation, in order that his master may be enabled to pay a higher rent, and his landlord to live beyond his means. At length this oppression reaches a pitch which is unendurable, and the people rebel against it, and turn their fury against the most prominent exactions. This is the true history of the outbreaks in Wales.

A bad woman told her husband that he was related to the devil. Only by marriage said he.

Extraordinary Occurrence.—(From a Barbadoes paper.)—On the 22d of August, the Brig Rowena was lying in Lagunayra Roads, the weather perfectly calm. I discovered the vessel moving about among the shipping. I could not conceive what could be the matter. I gave orders to heave in and see if the anchor was gone, but it was not; but, to my surprise, I found a tremendous monster entangled fast to the buoy-rope, and moving the anchor slowly along the bottom. I then had the fish towed on shore. It was of a flatish shape, something like a devil fish, but very curious shape, being wider than it was long, and having two tails, one each side of the mouth, and a very small tail in proportion to the fish, and exactly like a bar's tail. The tail can be seen on board the brig Rowena. The dimensions of the fish were as follows:—Length from end of the tail to end of the snout, 18 feet; from wing to wing, 20 feet; the mouth, 4 feet wide; and its weight 3,592 lbs.—[C. S. Diff.]

Hungerford Suspension Bridge.—It is intended to open this bridge in May next. The abutments on either side of the Thames, and the pier on the Hungerford side, are completed. The pier on the Lambeth side is expected to be finished by Christmas. The length from pier to pier will be 600 feet, the entire length of the bridge from the abutments on the Hungerford side to the opposite will be 1,400 feet. Its breadth in the 'clear' will be about 14 feet, and its height from the water level to the foot way 25 feet. The height of each pier, from its basement to its top, will be nearly 100 feet. The links that compose the supporting chains are made of malleable iron, 700 ton of which will be necessary for the construction of the bridge. The property required for approaches has cost £13,000, and a contract has been made for the completion of the bridge at a cost of £80,000. The total cost (including expenses incidental to the progress of the works, the Act of Parliament, &c.) will be £103,000. The proprietors calculate that a net annual income of £8,000 will be derived from tolls, being at the rate of 8 per cent. on the capital. 10,000 persons must cross the bridge daily to yield this sum.

The adulteration of guano is said to be carried on in this country to a dangerous and unwarrantable extent; and amongst the numerous methods by which the efficacy of this valuable manure is materially impaired is the admixture of stone, ground into fine powder.

It is said that a retailer of eggs, in one of the markets in Liverpool, turns over about £20,000 per annum in that article alone.

AINSWORTH'S MAGAZINE, FOR DECEMBER.

This popular magazine is kept up with great spirit; the present number is particularly rich. "Modern Chivalry" (concluded) is excellent. "My Fellow-Traveller's Adventure" is also finished in this number; it is really a very thrilling tale, and we cannot help giving an extract from this piece. It may be as well to explain, that this story was told upon the top of a coach; the extract commences when two travellers from France had just passed safely through the great forest of Ardennes, on their way to some town beyond it:—

"As soon as we were once more on the high-road, I could not help exclaiming. 'Well Pierre, here we are, you see, safe and sound, and not eaten up, as I supposed we should have been. We are out of danger now, I presume.'

I am not so sure of that, sir, was the reply of my companion; 'we may yet have difficulties to encounter.'

I ridiculed the idea, laughed at him for his folly, and putting spurs to my gallant grey, desired him to follow me.

I had not cantered above a mile after leaving the forest, when at a turn of the road, I came suddenly on a 'cabaret' or roadside inn, as you call it in this country. It might have been even termed an 'auberge,' for it gave promise of more comfort than the ordinary dram-shops which are to be found in every cross road in France. We had been on horseback for some hours, and I was not a little pleased at the opportunity which presented itself of rest and refreshment.

As Pierre and myself rode up to the door of this rural hotel, he examined attentively the superposition, and exclaimed, 'C'est drôle! the landlord is, or rather was, an old 'camarade' of mine at Metziers, many years ago—there cannot be two 'Maxime Bourdons', in this part of the country.

We were in the act of dismounting, when a barefooted urchin beckoned us to ride round into the stable-yard by a side gate. We did so; and having directed Pierre to look after the horses, I was on the point of making my way to the front of the house, when my attention was attracted by a female figure, of no ordinary mould, on a rude balcony, which ran round this portion of the premises, and from which a staircase, or rather steps, communicated with the yard below close to the spot where I was standing.

There was something so 'distingue' in her face, the outlines of which were the most perfect it was possible to conceive—an expression I cannot describe—but it was irresistibly winning. And to these advantages, so rare in one moving in so humble a sphere, were superadded a grace and a tournure absolutely enchanting. In short I was perdument amoureux at the first glance. To my surprise she shrunk from me, and repulsed me in so determined, and, at the same time, so dignified a manner, that, for the moment, I was thrown off my guard. Recovering my surprise, I renewed the attack, but the tone and manner were so decided, and the bearing of this singularly beautiful girl so lofty, firm, yet respectful, that I was annoyed with myself for having been such a fool. There was nothing of prudery, or even of anger, in her demeanour, for she appeared to regard me with sorrow and a mixture of pity. In short, her behaviour puzzled me no a little. Smiling under the rebuff I believed I said unto her, rather waspishly, 'Why do you repulse me? I dare say I am not the first young fellow who has fallen in love with your pretty face; and perhaps I have done no more than others who have frequented this house.'

What is the matter with you? You look unhappy.

She turned her eyes from me, with a look I shall never forget to my latest breath, and exclaimed, 'I am unhappy—wretched—miserable—and so would you be also, if you knew the doom that awaited you.'

And pray what is that? I asked incredulously, for I thought she was trifling with me.

Only, she replied, 'that you have not three hours to live—by that time you will be a corpse. I know not by what secret impulse it is that makes me say this to you, but I cannot resist forewarning you of your inevitable fate. Escape is hopeless; and you will meet with the same end as the other victims who have entered this room.'

'This is some idle fiction, you have conjured up,' I replied, to deter me from making love to you; perhaps there is some lover in the case, and you wish to frighten me by this improbable story.'

I call God to witness that I speak nothing but the painful truth, she rejoined.

But stop—you shall know all.

Having said this, she went to the door, and from thence into the passage, to listen if any one were within hearing.

Having ascertained that all was safe, she returned, and, closing the door after her, came up to me, and continued her appalling communication.

She looked at me with tears in her eyes, and then pointing to the floor said, look at this sand—did you ever see sand in a 'salles-manger' and that too on a first floor. Alas! what scenes of blood have been enacted here! You have ordered dinner—which is being prepared below—a few minutes before it is ready, you will see three officers, in the uniform of the Imperial guard ride into the courtyard—they will call loudly for the landlord—order dinner, champagne, and other luxuries. You will then be waited upon by the landlord himself, who will then announce the arrival of his distinguished guests, and request on such an emergency, that you will permit them to dine in this room with you: for although he is dinner sufficient for five persons at one table, yet if it were divided, it would not suffice for three and two in separate apartments—you must comply: for a refusal would only accelerate your doom: by complying, you will gain time, and God grant you may devise some plan, with your servant, for frustrating the schemes of these blood-thirsty wretches!

I was thunderstruck, as you may suppose, and could hardly believe my senses. I desired this lovely girl to send my servant up to me as soon as she could without exciting suspicion. This she did, and I repeated to Pierre every word she told me. He was incredulous for a long time, but on my dwelling on every particular, he became more attentive, although he could hardly believe that his old acquaintance of Metziers, who was the landlord, could lend himself to such a sanguinary plot. 'At all events,' he said,

THE NEIGHBOR.

PACIFIC INNUENDO.

The very candid, pacific, and highly creditable advice, which Governor Ford has done himself the honor to address to "the Citizens of Hancock county," "Mormons and all," and which appears in the "Warsaw Signal," of the 14th inst., is, like the balm of Gilead, well calculated to ease the pain, which has troubled the heads and hearts of the Carthagenians, Warrawians, and other over-jealous bodies for a long time. It certainly must be admitted, on all hands, that Governor Ford has exalted himself as a mediator, patriot, lawyer, Governor, peace maker, and friend of all; not only to magnify the law and make it honorable, but also in pointing out the path of peace. Such is what the Latter Day Saints have ever sought at the hands of those in authority; and, with an approving conscience, clear as the crystal spring; and with a laudible intention, warm as the summer zephyr; and with a charitable prayer, mellow as the morning dew, it is now our highest consolation to hope that all difficulties will cease; and give way to reason, sense, peace and good will. The saints if they will be humble and wise, can now practice what they preach and soften by good examples, rather than harden by a distant course of conduct, the hearts of the people.

For general information it may be well to say that there has never been any cause for alarm as to the Latter Day Saints. The legislature of Illinois granted a liberal charter for the city of Nauvoo; and let every honest man in the union, who has any knowledge of her, say whether she has not flourished beyond the most sanguine anticipations of all; and while they witness her growing glory; let them solemnly testify whether Nauvoo has not fully injured the country, county, or single individual one cent. With the strictest scrutiny publish the facts whether a particle of law has been evaded or broken: virtue and innocence need no artificial covering: Political views and party distinctions, never should disturb the harmony of society; and when the whole truth comes before a virtuous people: we are willing to abide the issue.

We will here refer to the three late dissimulations, upon writs of habeas corpus, of Joseph Smith, when arrested under the requisitions of Missouri. The first, in June 1841, was tried at Monmouth, before Judge Douglas, of the fifth Judicial Circuit, and no exceptions have been taken to that decision, by this State or Missouri, but Missouri had previously entered a solle prosequit on all the old indictments against the Mormons in the 4th circuit of 1838, it is taken and granted that that decision was just! The second, in December, 1842, was tried at Springfield before Judge Pope in the U. S. District Court, and, from that honorable discharge, no exceptions from any source have been made to those proceedings, it follows as a matter of course, that that decision was just! and the third, in July 1843, was tried at the city of Nauvoo, before the Municipal Court of said city; and as no exceptions to that discharge, have been taken, and as the Governor says there is evidence on the other side to show that the Sheriff of Lee county voluntarily carried Mr. Reynolds (who had Mr. Smith in custody), to the city of Nauvoo, without any coercion on the part of any one, it must be admitted that that decision was just!

But is any man still unconvinced of the justice of these strictures relative to the two last cases, let the astounding fact go forth, that, Orin Porter Rockwell, who, Boggs swore, was the principal in his assassination, and as necessary to which Mr. Smith was arrested, has returned home, "clear of that sin." In fact there was not a witness to get up an indictment against him.

The Messrs. Avery, who were unlawfully "transported out of this State," have returned to their families in peace, and there seems to be no ground for contention; no cause for jealousy; and no excuse for a surmise that any man, woman, or child, will suffer the least inconvenience, from General Smith; the charter of Nauvoo; the city of Nauvoo; or even any of her citizens. There is nothing for a bone of contention; even those Ordinances which appeared to excite the feelings of some people, have recently been repealed—so that, if the "intelligent" inhabitants of Hancock county, want peace; want to abide by the Governor's advice; want to have a character abroad grow out of their character at home; and really mean to follow the Savior's golden rule: "To do unto others as they would wish other to do unto them," they will be still, now, and let their own works praise them in the gates of justice, and in the eyes of the affronting world. Wise men ought to have understanding enough to conquer men with kindness.

"A soft answer turns away wrath," says the wiseman, and it will be greatly to the credit of the Latter Day Saints to show the love of God, by now kindly treating those who may have, in an unconscious manner, done them wrong; for truly said Jesus: pray for thine enemies. Humanity towards all; reason and refinement to enforce virtue; and good for evil, are so eminently designed to cure moral disorders of society, than an appeal to "arms," or even armed untempered with friendship, and the "one thing needful," that no vision for the future; guide-board for the distant; or expiator for the present, need trouble any one with what he ought to do. His own good, his family's good, his neighbor's good, his country's good, and all good, seem to whisper to every person: the Governor has told you what to do: now do it. The constitution expects every man to do his duty; and when he fails the law urges him; or should he do too much the same master rebukes him. Should reason, liberty, law, light, and philanthropy now guide the destinies of Hancock county with as much sincerity as has been manifested for her notoriety, or warfare; there can be no doubt that peace, prosperity, and happiness will prevail, and that future generations as well as the present one, will call Governor Ford a PEACE MAKER. The Latter Day Saints will, at all events, and profit by the instruction; and call upon honest men to help them cherish all the love; all the friendship; all the courtesy; all the kindly feelings; and all the generosity that ought to characterize dear people, in a clever neighborhood, and leave can did men to judge which tree exhibits the best fruit, the one with the most clubs and sticks thrown into its boughs, and the grass trodden down under it; or the one, with no sticks in it, some dead limbs and rank grass growing under it; for by their signs ye can know their fruit; and by the fruit ye know the tree. Our motto then, is, peace with all. If we have joy in the love of God, let us try to give a season of that joy, which all the world cannot gain; or resist. And may be, like, as when Paul started with recommendations to Damascus, to persecute the Saints, some one who has raised his hand against us with letters to men in high places, may see a light at noon-day above the brightness of the sun, and hear the voice of Jesus saying: "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks."

Intelligence is sometimes the messenger of safety; and willing to aid the Governor in his laudable endeavors to cultivate peace and honor, the laws; believing that very few of the citizens of Hancock county will be found in the negative of such a goodly course; and considering his views a kind of manifesto, or olive leaf, which shows that their is rest for the souls of the Saints; we give it a place in the Neighbor, wishing it God speed, and saying, God bless good men and good measures, and as Nauvoo has been, so it will continue to be, a good city, affording a good market to a good country; and let those who do not mean to try the way of transgressors, say Amen.

GOSPELIZATION WORKING A POWER.

Springfield, Jan. 29, 1844.

DEAR SIR:—I have received the copy of the proceedings and resolutions of a meeting of the citizens of Hancock county, which you did me the honor to send me.

I have observed with regret, that occasion have been presented, for disturbing the peace of your county; and if I knew what I could legally do to apply a corrective, I would be very ready to do it. But if you are a lawyer, or at all conversant with the law, you will know that I as a Governor have no right to interfere in your difficulties.

As yet, I believe, that there has been nothing like war among you; and I hope that all of you, will have the good sense to see the necessity of preserving peace. If there is anything wrong in the Nauvoo charters, or in the mode of administering them, you will see that nothing short of legislative or judicial power is capable of enforcing a remedy. I myself had the honor of calling the attention of the legislature to this subject at the last session; but a large majority of both political parties in that body, either did not see the evil which you complain of; or if they did they repeatedly refused to correct it. And yet a call is made upon me to do that which all parties refused to do at the last session. I have also been called upon to take away the arms from the Mormons; to raise the militia to arrest a supposed fugitive; and in fact to repeal some of the ordinances of the city of Nauvoo. Hancock county is justly famed for its intelligence; and I cannot believe that any of its citizens are so ignorant as not to know that I have no power to do these things. The absurd and preposterous nature of these requests give some color, to the charge that they are made for political effect only. I hope that this charge is untrue; for in all candor, it would be more credible to those concerned to have their errors attributed to ignorance than to a disposition to embroil the country in the horrors of war, for the advancement of party ends. But if there should be any truth in the charge, (which God forbid) I affectionately entreat all the good citizens engaged in it, to lay aside their designs, and yield up their ears to the voice of justice, reason, and humanity. All that I can do, at present, is to admonish both parties to be wary of carrying matters to extremity. Let it come to this: let a state of war ensue, and I will be compelled to interfere with executive power. In that case also, I wish in a friendly, affectionate, and candid manner, to tell the citizens of Hancock county, Mormons and all, that my interference will be against those who shall be the first transgressors. I am bound by the laws and the constitution to regard you all as citizens of the state, possessed of equal rights and privileges; and to cherish the rights of one as dearly as the rights of another. I can know no distinction among you except that of assistant and assailed.

I hope, Dear Sir, you will do me the favor to publish this letter in the papers of your country, for the satisfaction of all persons concerned.

I am, with the highest respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS FORD.

We find that Gen. Joseph Smith's correspondence with Arlington Bennett, is attracting the attention of many of our leading papers; it has been published by several of the most prominent in the Union, among which is the "New York Herald," and "Niles' National Register."

We clip the following from Niles' National Register, of Feb. 3.

ILLINOIS.

The MORMONS. This singular community contrive to make themselves of importance. Numbering as they do, many thousands persons, all moving with perfect devotion at the nod of their prophet, and burning with ardor in a cause which most of them believe to be of divine authority,—holding as they do grants made to them from time to time by the legislature of Illinois, a very large, not to say unusual corporate powers,—and wielding as they are well aware the balance of power between the two great political parties in the State, they feel their importance, and contrive to make others feel it also. Under the superintendence of a man of no small natural capacity, by the labor of those thousands, most of them industrious individuals, wonders have certainly been performed in the wilderness. Besides the building of the Temple, the Hotel, nay the city itself of Nauvoo where they a few years since took up their abode, great improvements have been effected. The editor of the Hawk Eye remarks:

"Although much complaint has been made about the Mormons, we saw, on our late trip evidences of improvement on our prairies, which we consider highly creditable to the Mormons who made them, and without whom we doubt whether they would have been made for many years to come. All those who have travelled over the large prairie between Fort Madison, Warsaw, and Carthage, remember how dreary it was a few years since. Now it is studded with houses and good farms. The English, who understand hedging and ditching far better than our people, have gone upon that prairie and have enclosed extensive fields in this manner. Along the old Rock Island Trace, which we travelled seven years ago and which was then a dreary waste, we saw a field enclosed with a good sod fence, six miles long and one wide. We think such enterprise is worthy to be mentioned. As long as the Mormons are harmless and do not interfere with the rights of our people, we think they should be treated well. We shall never convince them that they are a deluded people, as for as their religious notions are concerned in any other way."

But the object in view in noticing those people at present is to exhibit recent movements of very singular aspect both as to law and politics. The correspondence between Joseph Smith, the prophet of the sect, and J. C. Calhoun, one of the candidates for the presidency, which will be found in the political department of this number, is sufficiently characteristic of the man who commenced, and concludes the said correspondence, and furnishes something as unique in abstract notions as our readers have lately met with.

The St. Louis New Era, of the 29th says:—

"A meeting was recently held at Nauvoo, to express the sentiments of the Mormons in relation to the repeated demands by the state of Missouri for the body of General Joseph Smith, 'as well as the common cruel practice of kidnapping citizens of Illinois and forcing them across the Mississippi river, and then incarcerating them in the dungeons or prisons of Missouri.'"

The following preamble and resolutions were adopted:—

Whereas the state of Missouri, with the governor at the head, continues to make demands upon the executive of Illinois for the body of General Joseph Smith, as we believe, to keep up a system of persecution against the church of the Latter Day Saints, for the purpose of justifying the said state of Missouri in her diabolical, unchristian, and unconstitutional warfare against said Church of the Latter Day Saints, and which she has practised during the last twelve years, whereby many have been murdered, mobbed, and ravished, and the whole community expelled from the state.

And also to have dust in the eyes of the nation and the world, while she, as a state, with a government to back her, continues to slip over the river and steal the property of the Latter Day Saints, and kidnap the members of the said church, to glut their vengeance, malice, revenge, and avarice; and to make slaves of the said captives or murder them: Therefore,

Resolved unanimously, as we do know that Joseph Smith is not guilty of any charge made against him by the said state of Missouri, but is a good, industrious, well meaning, and worthy citizen of Illinois, and an officer that does faithfully and impartially administer the laws of the state, that we, as citizens of Illinois, crave the protection of the constitution and laws of the country as an aegis to shield him, the said General Joseph Smith, from such cruel persecutions, beseeching the governor of Illinois not to issue any more writs against the said General Joseph Smith, or other Latter Day Saints, (unless they are guilty,) but to let the Latter Day Saints "breathe awhile like other men," and enjoy the liberty guaranteed to every honest citizen by the Magna Charta of our common country."

The city authorities have also passed "an extra ordinance for the extra case of Joseph Smith and others," the principal provision of which is that—

"If any person or persons shall come with process, demand, or requisition, founded upon the aforesaid Missouri difficulties, to arrest said Joseph Smith, he or they shall be subject to be arrested by any officer of the city, with or without process, and tried by the municipal court, upon testimony, and if found guilty, sentenced to imprisonment in the city prison for life, which convict or convicts can only be pardoned by the governor with the consent of the mayor of the said city."

At a meeting held at a more recent period, it is said, that—

"After some pertinent remarks by Mr. Taylor, General Joseph Smith briefly addressed the meeting; and he disclaimed entirely from the opinions of the Attorney General, and observed that it was stated in the charter that the legion was a part of the militia of Illinois, and that his commission declared that he (General Smith) was Lieutenant General of the Nauvoo Legion and of the militia of the State of Illinois, and as such, it was not only his duty to enforce the city ordinances, but the laws of the State, when called on by the Governor. He also stated that he had been informed that the chief magistrate of Missouri had it in contemplation to make another requisition on the Governor of Illinois for him, Joseph Smith."

In the Nauvoo Neighbor, we find an ordinance amended by the city authorities on the 10th instant which we suppose to be a substitute for the foregoing.

It ordains that "to prevent kidnapping, illegal arrests of persons, or unlawful searches for property, that all writs or warrants issued out of the city shall be executed within the limits of said city, be examined by, and receive the approval and signature of the Mayor of said city on the back of said process, and be served by the marshal of said city."

"And that every officer who shall execute or attempt to execute any process as aforesaid, without first obtaining the approval and signature of the mayor of said city as specified in the first section of this ordinance, shall be subject to a fine of not less than five dollars nor more than one hundred dollars or imprisonment not less than one month nor more than six months in the city prison, or both, as a breach of ordinance to be tried before the municipal court of said city."

"Nothing in the foregoing ordinance shall be so construed as to prevent, hinder, or thwart the designs of justice, or to retard the civil officers of the state or county in the discharge of their official duties; but to aid and assist them within the limits of the city."

This ordinance is signed by "Joseph Smith, mayor."

But the most curious of this history we derive from a previous number of the Neighbor, in which we find a correspondence between Joe Smith and the celebrated Ennet, the former commander-in-chief of the Nauvoo legion, mayor of the city, and right hand man; but who is will be remembered by our readers subsequently denounced Joseph as the vilest hypocrite and scoundrel that ever deceived men and women, and threatened loudly to blow up the whole concern. This Bennett it is stated by some, is disposed to become a candidate for one of the highest offices in the state of Illinois, and in order to success proceeds to make overtures to the prophet. His letter and reply are as follows:—

Here follows the letter of James Arlington Bennett, and also the response of General Joseph Smith, and John C. Calhoun, both of which have been published in the Neighbor.

It will be perceived that the editor of the Register, is laboring under a mistake about John C. Bennett. It was not John C. Bennett who, is now in the western country, who wrote the letter to Mr. Smith, but James Arlington Bennett of Long Island.

We believe in the statements of the editor of the "Register," that the Mormons are of importance, and that their leader is also a man of importance. Important men always choose important leaders, and we would suggest for the particular consideration of the editor of the Register, the following lines of Dr. Watt, although written to children, they may be applicable to men:

"I would be walking with the wise,
That I may wiser grow."

Mr. Editor, if you wish to associate with great men, come to Nauvoo.

The Ordinances above, having answered the purpose designed, have since been repealed.

To the Editor of the Neighbor:

(Sir: I wish to say to you, as there seems to be a prospect of peace, that it will be more love-like, God-like, and man-like, to say nothing about the "Warsaw Signal." If the editor breathes out that old sulphurous blast, let him go and besmear his reputation and the reputation of those that uphold him, with soot and dirt; but as for us, and all honest men, we will not call our part for there the honor lies." We will honor the advice of Governor Ford; cultivate peace and friendship with all; mind our own business and come off with flying colors, respected, because, in respecting others, we respect ourselves.)

Respectfully, I am

JOSEPH SMITH.

Nauvoo, Feb. 10, 1844.

We certainly approve very highly of the above sentiment; we have pursued this course ever since we have had any charge of the editorial department of the papers of Nauvoo, and we now see nothing in that paper to lead us to alter our course for two reasons. The first is we never have considered the filthy effusions of that paper any scandal, and in the second place, we knew that to have anything printed in that paper was not publishing it, inasmuch as it is too limited in its circulation for the public to know anything about it. Therefore, for us to publish their trash would be doing that for them which they could not do for themselves.

PUBLIC MEETING.

Many of the more respectable citizens of Warsaw, indignant at the moves of the Anti-Mormon party, and feeling desirous of ridding themselves from the odium of being considered their associates, assembled at an Anti-Mormon meeting, and passed the following resolutions, presented by E. A. Bedell, a Justice of the Peace, of that place:

"Whereas, By a recent publication which appeared in the Warsaw Message, an Anti Mormon meeting has been called in the town of Warsaw, for the avowed purpose of getting up a thorough Anti-Mormon organization, in accordance with various requests made by various other meetings recently held in our county, under the imposing title of Anti-Mormonism.

And, Whereas, Judging from the expressions of the sentiments of those convened in said meetings (though varying among themselves,) we deem their sentiments and policy as injurious to the best interests of our country.

And, Whereas, Inflammatory Resolutions, emanating and issued from a public meeting, called and held in our town, would be attributed to and deemed expressive of the sentiments of a majority of the citizens of said town; Therefore

Resolved, That we at this time deem it inexpedient to hold meetings under such titles, and pass inflammatory resolutions for the express purpose of exciting and keeping up an excitement in the

"I will go back to the stable, under the plea of looking to the horses," and return with our pistols, which I can conceal in my pockets." In a few minutes he rejoined me, and we had scarcely begun to talk of the extraordinary tale that had been communicated to us, when the tramping of horses' feet was heard, and three officers, dressed as the girl had described, entered the yard of the inn. Thus far the story was confirmed. Conviction of the truth now took possession of Pierre's mind.

"It is too true," he said. "I will go back to the stable, and I think of what is best to be done. In the mean time, the landlord will doubtless come to you; and it is better we should not be seen together."

He had not left the room five minutes ere mine host made his appearance. A more specious and obsequious Boniface you never beheld. As the girl had predicted, his opening speech was to the effect that I would be trusted, pardon the liberty he was about to take in proposing that three officers of the Imperial guard should dine in my room. "He had dinner for five certainly; but if the repeat he had prepared was served up in two separate apartments, there would not be sufficient for either party. He assured me, moreover, that I could not fail to be pleased with the society of these gentlemen, as they were officers of rank."

Putting as good a face on the matter, as I could, I expressed my willingness to meet his wishes, and those of the officers.

I added, however, that I trusted the newly-arrived gentlemen would excuse my servant sitting at the same table with them; that I was traveling for my health, and he was seldom from my side, as I was subject to sudden attacks of spasms. I thought the fellow appeared rather disconcerted at this announcement, but not pretending to notice the effect my communication had produced, he requested him as he left the room to send my servant up stairs, as I wished to take some cordial before dinner. Pierre soon made his appearance, and putting my pistols into my hand, he said, "All is but too true, Monsieur, courage, and we shall be masters of the field. I have arranged my plan, and you must follow my instructions. The captain of this infernal band of cut-throats, you must place at the bottom of the table, facing you; his two confederates you must request to sit on one side of the table, while I take my seat opposite to them. As soon as I have helped myself to a glass of wine, after the desert is placed on the table, you must shoot the scoundrel facing you! shrink not, for on your nerve and presence of mind depend our safety. Leave the rest to me; we have a desperate game to play—courage and courage alone are wanting to ensure success."

I promised compliance, and was picturing to myself the scene in which I was so soon to play so prominent a part, when the three soi-disant officers made their appearance, ushered in by the landlord. The fellows were dressed to perfection—rather outré as to dandyism; for they were oiled, curled, and scented as the veriest petit maitre in the recherche salons of Paris. Their address was rather of the free and easy school, somewhat overdone, perhaps, but still there was nothing offensive in their manner.

They were polite in their thanks for the honor conferred upon them by allowing them to dine with me, in short, they acted their parts to the life. The glances that had been interchanged amongst themselves as they entered the apartment, when they beheld Pierre, had not escaped my observation. I therefore, as soon as they had expended their volley of compliments and thanks, apologized for being compelled to have my servant at the table, assigning the same reason I had given the landlord. At length the soup was served, then the goulas, a friandaise, stewed ducks, and a roasted capon.

Every mouthful I took, I thought would have choked me; and my want of appetite, which was remarked, I attributed to the state of my health. The fellows, ate, drank, laughed, and chatted away in the most amiable manner possible.

The dinner was by this time nearly brought to a conclusion. The girl had waited upon us, and during her absence from the room with the remains of the dinner, one of the miscreants opposite to Pierre appeared to be searching about his person for some missing object, at last he said, "I have lost my snuff-box." And addressing himself to my attendant, added, "I will thank you to go down stairs, and on the dresser in the kitchen you will see a gold snuff-box—for I must have left it there—and bring it up to me."

Pierre, however to my great delight, never quitted the room, and very quietly remarked, that he never executed any orders but those of his master. The person addressed looked confused at this reply, and bit his lips with rage. Turning to me, he requested very politely that I would send my servant for the box in question. To my infinite relief, and as good luck would have it, the girl reappeared with the cheese, and some fruit, and I observed to the gentleman of the snuff box, that la fille would fetch it for him.

Mademoiselle was, accordingly, commissioned to execute the errand, but she presently returned, saying there was no tobacco to be found below.

"Nimporte," said the fellow; bring us some champagne.

While this very pleasant beverage was gone for, the other officer discovered that his pocket-handkerchief was absent without leave, and ordered Pierre to go to the kitchen and look for it. This command, however, was disobeyed in like manner; for my trusty follower replied, "The servant will be here directly with the devil."

and she can bring it you." The champagne was brought, and ere the cork was let loose from its confinement, the pocket-handkerchief was accidentally discovered under the table!

The girl now left the room; and never shall I forget the look, she gave me as she closed the door. It seemed to say, "the world has closed on you for ever!—we shall never see each other again."

The bottle was passed, and as Pierre helped himself, he turned towards me, and a glance of the eye told what he meant. He put the glass to his lips; but placing it suddenly on the table, said to me, "I hope you are not ill, sir?" "No," I replied. "I knew what he meant," but I was powerless. He added, Monsieur must take some cordial; he put his hands in his pockets, and drew forth a brace of pistols, and levelling them with a deadly aim at his opposite neighbours, shot them both through the heart at the same moment. He then sprang like a tiger on the captain at the foot of the table, which was upset in the general melee, caught him by the throat, and called me to come to his assistance. I had in some degree recovered from the stupefaction, for my senses had been paralysed, if I may use the expression; and ran to the faithful fellow.

We contrived to pinion the scoundrel between us; and I made assurance doubly sure, Pierre bound one end of the table cloth over the villain's face, while, with the other, he fastened his arms behind him.

"Now, Monsieur," said he, stand over this scelerat with your pistols, until I return from the stable with a cord; he rushed down the stairs, and was back with me in less than two minutes. We bound our friend fast, hand and foot. "And now," said Pierre, you must remain here until I have ridden to the nearest post-town, which is not above two leagues from this: I will bring back assistance, and give our prisoner into safe custody."

There is not a living being below—the hour is empty. You have nothing to apprehend—not a soul will molest you.

I must first catch a horse, for ours have been turned loose. There was one in the yard just now; and you may rely upon it I will lose no time in returning with some military and police, and release you from your unpleasant situation."

I had the satisfaction of hearing my brave and faithful attendant gallop off in a minute. My position in the mean time was none of the pleasantest. I made up my mind to sell my life dearly, in the event of any attempt at rescue; and what with watching the door, and the wretch at my feet, I had no very agreeable time of it. The two hours I thus spent, I thought the longest I had ever experienced. Thanks to a merciful Providence, the trial I had undergone was brought to a termination.
